tor the presidency, Michael Collins, addressing the Dail, said he would not object to the re-election of de Valera. Even in those early days the split between the Catholics and Protestants was marked. The Irish Episcopal Church was the state church, and Catholics were, it is claimed, for many years sadly persecuted. The emeripation bill at last gave the Catholics equal rights with their Protestant brethren, and the disestablishment of the Irish Church in 1869 completed their religious freedom.

The Protestants always leaned to-

The Protestants always leaned toward England in their sympathies, partly from the fact that many of them were immigrants in the island, and partly because their religious affiliations were British rather than Irish. The Catholics, on the other hand, mindful of the persecutions to which their forefathers had told them they were subjected in the early days, have nearly always been anti-English in feeling.

legislative suggestions, and if carried out will bring numerous changes and eforms at the city hall. His suggestions go on to the committees interested for immediate consideration.

Perhaps most important to all rate-payers, as it directly affects their pocket is the new mayor's initial recommendation for consideration, that the expenditure for the year should not exceed the debentures expiring. In doing so the mayor calls attention to the steady increase in the debenture debt of the city in the last twelve years. He asks that the finance committee go into his suggestion
