Says Money is Foundation of Matrimony

Beware the Jobless Suitor—The Real Test of a Man's Love for a Woman Is Not What He Tells Her, But What He Does For Her.

A young girl writes to me that she is very much in love with a man whom her parents refuse to let her marry because he cannot support her. She says that he is good-looking and well educated and moral, and that there is nothing the matter with him, except that he has no way of making a living. She considers that her parents are very foolish to object to that, and she wants to know what I think about it.

I think the parents are dead right, and that nothing more disqualifies a man for matrimony than not having a good steady job, that pulls down a pay check commensurate with the way in which he and the girl he marries have been accustomed to live.

Matrimony is a matter of money as well as of sentiment, and the structure of domestic happiness that is not built on a good, sound, solid, substantial foundation very soon comes toppling down about the ears of those who have thought that they could live in a fool's paradise.

It is, perhaps, natural for a silly young girl, whose wants have always been provided for by her parents, to believe that love and romance are the only things that count in the world, and that she could live on bread and cheese and kisses. She is convinced that her beloved Augustus will be all-in-all to her, and that when she is married to him she will be lifted above the material things of earth, and have no care about what she eats, or where she lives, or about such mundane things as clothes.

Unfortunately, love's young dream is as substantial a diet as moon-beams, and those who attempt to live upon it soon find that they have an aching void that cries aloud for beefsteak and onions and corn beef and cabbage, and when these are not forthcoming, romance goes into the discard. For it is sad but true that our bodies must be fed and comforted before we even inquire how it is with our souls.

Angelina won't believe me, but it is the honest-to-goodness truth I am telling her when I assure her that if she marries a man who can't support her, in less than six months she won't be asking him if he worships her with his whole heart and if he is sure that he will never love her less than he does now. She will be wanting to know why he can't get something to do and make a decent living for her.

This isn't because Angelina has grown sordid and mercenary. It is because life goes on after marriage just as it did before marriage. You grow just as hungry after marriage, and desire three square meals a day as ardently as you did before marriage. You crave a comfortable place to live, in the same old way, and you find that you have just the same desire for good clothes and amusements after you enter the holy estate as you did before you entered it.

The woman who marries a man who can't support her is foredoomed to lose out because she soon finds her romance in tatters and her affection dead. For no woman can love a man she does not respect, and no woman can respect a man who is too lazy and shiftless to make a living for his family.

A woman can forgive a man any other crime on earth easier than she can just being no account, lacking the energy, the grit and the determination to get on in the world, and when she realizes that she is tied for life to this kind of a man, she is filled with a withering contempt of him that burns up the last shred of sentiment she has in her heart for him. No wife is so miserable as she who is ashamed of her husband because he cannot hold his own among other men.

Angelina thinks her parents are cruel because they are not willing for her to marry a man who cannot make a living. Let her reflect that if a man cannot support his family some one else must take on his job. Does Angelina feel that it is fair and just to ask her old father to undertake to feed and clothe a worthless son-in-law and his progeny?

Believe me, the woman who has to go back home after she is married and be dependent upon her people for the last drops in the cup of humiliation. She knows what it is to be "poor Angelina-ed," to be pitted as a failure by her friends, to be resented by her brothers and sisters, and to even be regarded as a burden by her parents.

Does Angelina think that she would enjoy supporting an able-bodied man who is too temperamental, or who was born too tired to work? That is better than grafting one's living and one's husband's living off papa, but Angelina will soon ascertain that the man who sits down and lets a woman work for him has ceased to be the hero of her romantic dreams and becomes a figure too contemptible for her to burn incense at his feet any more.

Furthermore, the minute a man takes money from a woman and becomes dependent upon her, that minute he begins to hate her. I know hundreds of women who support their husbands, and I do not know a single man in the whole lot who is not like a surly dog that bites the hand that feeds it.

So, Angelina, if you value your own happiness, don't marry a man who cannot support you. You don't need riches to marry on, but you need enough to be independent on. And any worthwhile man can make that.

Have nothing to do with the man who quotes poetry, and tells you how he adores you, but who shies away from a job. The real test of a man's love for a woman is not what he tells her, but what he does for her. There are many ways of love-making, but the only one that counts says it with WORK.

That is why it isn't safe to marry a man who can't support you. DOROTHY DIX.

Rivals Her Daughter In Youthful Beauty

A well-known society matron whose youthful beauty is so well preserved that she is regarded as her daughter's rival in this respect—though she does not pose as such—attributes her girlish complexion chiefly to mercolized wax. She says:

"I am convinced that many cosmetics, by overloading the skin and pores, tend to age the complexion. Mercolized wax has just the opposite effect. It keeps the pores clean, permitting them to breathe, and removes dead particles of cuticle which are constantly appearing after which, give the complexion that aged look. Whenever my skin begins to get the least bit off-color, muddy or faded, I go to my drugstore for an ounce of mercolized wax; I apply this nightly, like cold cream, for a week or so, washing it off mornings. This is what keeps my complexion so clean, fresh, white and soft."—Adv.
