

RELIABLE STORAGE. ROBERT GARRIE. 27 Front-st. East.

FIFTEENTH YEAR

A Long Trip After a Defaulter. DETECTIVE MURRAY'S JOURNEY In Search of a Private Banker Who Stole $30,000.

Traced to Lima, Peru. Thence to Chili. Agents to the Argentine Republic sent...

HENRY Charles Aitken, until August, 1892, a private banker at Tottenham, Ont., has to thank the present troubles in Rio Janeiro for the fact that he is still enjoying life, with other defaulters, in South America.

Chief Government Detective John Murray arrived in the city Saturday night after a five months' trip in search of the forger...

Bank of Hamilton at Toronto. When the forger had been closed at Tottenham he took over the business and opened a private bank, notes discounted by him being re-discounted by the Bank of Hamilton.

Like many others, Aitken was tempted to speculate to increase his stock, when the market went against him he used the funds of depositors, and finally resorted to forgery.

On August 2, 1892, Aitken disappeared. The Bank of Hamilton, which held about $20,000 worth of his paper, sent an inspector to Tottenham to examine his books.

But Aitken had saved the books and notes, and he had gone carefully and thoroughly over the books himself, and opposite every genuine note had marked the word "good," so that the total amount of the forgeries was at once apparent.

Traces to Prove He Had Committed Suicide. Before leaving Aitken had cleaned out the vaults and the depositors, of whom there were many, lost every dollar of the funds they had entrusted to him.

On the 17th of October, 1892, the Argentine Republic reported the extradition of Aitken, who had been seen at Burlington, Vt., the night of his disappearance and an attempt was made by friends to establish the report, equally indistinctly circulated, that he had committed suicide.

Whether Aitken took this steamship or crossed the Andes to Buenos Ayres could not be ascertained. Murray decided to go to Argentina by way of the Cordilleras.

This necessitated an eight day trip, most of the distance across the mountains being encompassed on the back of a mule.

He had for fellow travelers Ernest Carro, a town in the Argentine Republic, and Maurice de Jolly, a Parisian steamboat manager.

While en route across the mountains Detective Murray had the misfortune to lose a valuable gold watch. The watch fell from his hands and was smashed to pieces by the feet of the mule he was riding.

On arrival at Buenos Ayres Detective Murray ascertained that there was an extradition treaty between the English Government and Argentina, but as yet it had not been signed by the President of the Argentine Republic.

It was reported that there was to be a clause inserted in the treaty to cover the case of Jabez Spencer Bluff, M.P., the president of the famous "Bluff" Co. of England, who fled after involving his friends to the extent of $30,000,000.

A town in the Argentine Republic, which is the capital of the province of that name. Bluff was brought to Buenos Ayres, but was liberated and subsequently fled to Bolivia, where he was still in hiding when Detective Murray left.

San Defector McCrae of St. Kitts. While in Buenos Ayres Mr. Murray saw Senor Don Enrique M. Read, a festive gentleman, whose baptismal name was A. M. Murray. Mr. Murray was manager of the Security Loan and Savings Company of St. Catherine and when in September, 1891, he left St. Kitts for Buenos Ayres he took with him $30,000 of the company's money, and, it is said, a charming black-eyed widow. Since then Mr. Murray has not been known in St. Kitts.

On the 17th of October, 1892, the Argentine Republic reported the extradition of Aitken, who had been seen at Burlington, Vt., the night of his disappearance and an attempt was made by friends to establish the report, equally indistinctly circulated, that he had committed suicide.

Whether Aitken took this steamship or crossed the Andes to Buenos Ayres could not be ascertained. Murray decided to go to Argentina by way of the Cordilleras.

This necessitated an eight day trip, most of the distance across the mountains being encompassed on the back of a mule.

He had for fellow travelers Ernest Carro, a town in the Argentine Republic, and Maurice de Jolly, a Parisian steamboat manager.

While en route across the mountains Detective Murray had the misfortune to lose a valuable gold watch. The watch fell from his hands and was smashed to pieces by the feet of the mule he was riding.

On arrival at Buenos Ayres Detective Murray ascertained that there was an extradition treaty between the English Government and Argentina, but as yet it had not been signed by the President of the Argentine Republic.

It was reported that there was to be a clause inserted in the treaty to cover the case of Jabez Spencer Bluff, M.P., the president of the famous "Bluff" Co. of England, who fled after involving his friends to the extent of $30,000,000.

A town in the Argentine Republic, which is the capital of the province of that name. Bluff was brought to Buenos Ayres, but was liberated and subsequently fled to Bolivia, where he was still in hiding when Detective Murray left.

San Defector McCrae of St. Kitts. While in Buenos Ayres Mr. Murray saw Senor Don Enrique M. Read, a festive gentleman, whose baptismal name was A. M. Murray. Mr. Murray was manager of the Security Loan and Savings Company of St. Catherine and when in September, 1891, he left St. Kitts for Buenos Ayres he took with him $30,000 of the company's money, and, it is said, a charming black-eyed widow. Since then Mr. Murray has not been known in St. Kitts.

On the 17th of October, 1892, the Argentine Republic reported the extradition of Aitken, who had been seen at Burlington, Vt., the night of his disappearance and an attempt was made by friends to establish the report, equally indistinctly circulated, that he had committed suicide.

Whether Aitken took this steamship or crossed the Andes to Buenos Ayres could not be ascertained. Murray decided to go to Argentina by way of the Cordilleras.

This necessitated an eight day trip, most of the distance across the mountains being encompassed on the back of a mule.

He had for fellow travelers Ernest Carro, a town in the Argentine Republic, and Maurice de Jolly, a Parisian steamboat manager.

While en route across the mountains Detective Murray had the misfortune to lose a valuable gold watch. The watch fell from his hands and was smashed to pieces by the feet of the mule he was riding.

Minister, who already had correspondence from Foreign Minister Lord Rosebery in reference to the case. He communicated at once with the Secretary for Foreign Affairs in the Peruvian Government and as a result Mr. Murray was at once put in communication with Col. Manuel P. de Luna, Asst. Secy. of the Peruvian Legation in Lima.

As none of the Peruvians speak English, the Minister instructed Murray to go to Callao and get Mr. Wilton to come with him to Lima to interpret to the officials. This was done and an official was issued from the State Department commanding any or all officials in the Republic of Peru to arrest and detain Aitken.

Mr. Murray then called at the South American branch of the race horse of New York and Manager Holcomb promised to do all he could to assist. Shown the photograph of the accused he remarked: "Your man is here. I have seen him myself several times in the street."

Holcomb then gave Mr. Murray several letters, including one to the Peruvian Incorporated Company (Limited), President Dawkins, an Englishman, and his company assumed the track debt of the Government, and took their mines, railroads and lands as security.

A visit to President Dawkins showed that the President had been up at Callao on the steamer with him from Callao to Molando. He sent for Superintendent Aitken of the Peruvian railroads who also recognized Aitken from his photograph, and stated that he had seen him frequently.

The photograph was shown next to a list of the officials of the road, several of whom also recognized the photograph. Manager E. J. Frew of the silver mines at Chalapala stated that Aitken had been up at the mines, which are located on the Andes 100 miles from Lima.

Mr. Evans, a street broker, stated that he had seen Aitken daily in Lima and conversed with him. Aitken stated that he was anxious to return to an English school, and Evans informed Evans that he had not met with much success and intended to leave for Valparaiso. Probably a dozen or so in all recognized Aitken from the photograph as a man they had seen.

Mr. Murray heard that Aitken on leaving Lima had disembarked at Iquique. He took a steamer bound for that place, but in order to make sure Aitken had not disembarked at any other port he called at Pisco, Mollando, Arica and Pasque. On arrival at Iquique he learned that the man had been there in company with another Englishman, also supposed to be a defaulter, had outstayed there for several hours during the detention of the steamer. A week later, on the arrival of the steamer, Murray proceeded to Valparaiso, calling at Cobija, Bolivia, Antofagasta, Caldera and Coquimbo en route.

On arrival at Valparaiso he conferred with the British consul and the Valparaiso house of Grace Bros. of New York, the latter detesting Aitken, and best posted in Lima as to his possible assistance. After several days' search Murray discovered where Aitken had been taking his meals.

He established at a western restaurant in order to substantiate clues obtained, proceeded to Santiago to confer with British Consul J. G. Kennedy and the Minister for Foreign Relations. The latter directed him to Signor Bacanann, his deputy. After a lengthy talk Signor Bacanann stated that the Government would not surrender the fugitive, as there was no treaty between England and Chile.

While willing to resign, Aitken was highly respected throughout the County of Simcoe. He was very musical, and spent much of his time at the piano, composing as he went along.

Like many others, Aitken was tempted to speculate to increase his stock, when the market went against him he used the funds of depositors, and finally resorted to forgery.

On August 2, 1892, Aitken disappeared. The Bank of Hamilton, which held about $20,000 worth of his paper, sent an inspector to Tottenham to examine his books.

But Aitken had saved the books and notes, and he had gone carefully and thoroughly over the books himself, and opposite every genuine note had marked the word "good," so that the total amount of the forgeries was at once apparent.

Traces to Prove He Had Committed Suicide. Before leaving Aitken had cleaned out the vaults and the depositors, of whom there were many, lost every dollar of the funds they had entrusted to him.

On the 17th of October, 1892, the Argentine Republic reported the extradition of Aitken, who had been seen at Burlington, Vt., the night of his disappearance and an attempt was made by friends to establish the report, equally indistinctly circulated, that he had committed suicide.

Whether Aitken took this steamship or crossed the Andes to Buenos Ayres could not be ascertained. Murray decided to go to Argentina by way of the Cordilleras.

This necessitated an eight day trip, most of the distance across the mountains being encompassed on the back of a mule.

He had for fellow travelers Ernest Carro, a town in the Argentine Republic, and Maurice de Jolly, a Parisian steamboat manager.

While en route across the mountains Detective Murray had the misfortune to lose a valuable gold watch. The watch fell from his hands and was smashed to pieces by the feet of the mule he was riding.

On arrival at Buenos Ayres Detective Murray ascertained that there was an extradition treaty between the English Government and Argentina, but as yet it had not been signed by the President of the Argentine Republic.

It was reported that there was to be a clause inserted in the treaty to cover the case of Jabez Spencer Bluff, M.P., the president of the famous "Bluff" Co. of England, who fled after involving his friends to the extent of $30,000,000.

A town in the Argentine Republic, which is the capital of the province of that name. Bluff was brought to Buenos Ayres, but was liberated and subsequently fled to Bolivia, where he was still in hiding when Detective Murray left.

San Defector McCrae of St. Kitts. While in Buenos Ayres Mr. Murray saw Senor Don Enrique M. Read, a festive gentleman, whose baptismal name was A. M. Murray. Mr. Murray was manager of the Security Loan and Savings Company of St. Catherine and when in September, 1891, he left St. Kitts for Buenos Ayres he took with him $30,000 of the company's money, and, it is said, a charming black-eyed widow. Since then Mr. Murray has not been known in St. Kitts.

On the 17th of October, 1892, the Argentine Republic reported the extradition of Aitken, who had been seen at Burlington, Vt., the night of his disappearance and an attempt was made by friends to establish the report, equally indistinctly circulated, that he had committed suicide.

Whether Aitken took this steamship or crossed the Andes to Buenos Ayres could not be ascertained. Murray decided to go to Argentina by way of the Cordilleras.

This necessitated an eight day trip, most of the distance across the mountains being encompassed on the back of a mule.

He had for fellow travelers Ernest Carro, a town in the Argentine Republic, and Maurice de Jolly, a Parisian steamboat manager.

While en route across the mountains Detective Murray had the misfortune to lose a valuable gold watch. The watch fell from his hands and was smashed to pieces by the feet of the mule he was riding.

On arrival at Buenos Ayres Detective Murray ascertained that there was an extradition treaty between the English Government and Argentina, but as yet it had not been signed by the President of the Argentine Republic.

It was reported that there was to be a clause inserted in the treaty to cover the case of Jabez Spencer Bluff, M.P., the president of the famous "Bluff" Co. of England, who fled after involving his friends to the extent of $30,000,000.

A town in the Argentine Republic, which is the capital of the province of that name. Bluff was brought to Buenos Ayres, but was liberated and subsequently fled to Bolivia, where he was still in hiding when Detective Murray left.

San Defector McCrae of St. Kitts. While in Buenos Ayres Mr. Murray saw Senor Don Enrique M. Read, a festive gentleman, whose baptismal name was A. M. Murray. Mr. Murray was manager of the Security Loan and Savings Company of St. Catherine and when in September, 1891, he left St. Kitts for Buenos Ayres he took with him $30,000 of the company's money, and, it is said, a charming black-eyed widow. Since then Mr. Murray has not been known in St. Kitts.

On the 17th of October, 1892, the Argentine Republic reported the extradition of Aitken, who had been seen at Burlington, Vt., the night of his disappearance and an attempt was made by friends to establish the report, equally indistinctly circulated, that he had committed suicide.

Whether Aitken took this steamship or crossed the Andes to Buenos Ayres could not be ascertained. Murray decided to go to Argentina by way of the Cordilleras.

This necessitated an eight day trip, most of the distance across the mountains being encompassed on the back of a mule.

He had for fellow travelers Ernest Carro, a town in the Argentine Republic, and Maurice de Jolly, a Parisian steamboat manager.

While en route across the mountains Detective Murray had the misfortune to lose a valuable gold watch. The watch fell from his hands and was smashed to pieces by the feet of the mule he was riding.

Security Company has made earnest efforts to induce him to return. Detective Murray also saw a well-known United States confidence man and several other defaulters. He had the good or ill-luck to be taken for James Thibault, Boston defaulter, and in that way came in contact with many people who left their country for their country's good.

Travelling With Another Defaulter. Mr. Murray learned that Aitken had left for Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, shortly after his arrival in Buenos Ayres in company with another defaulter, boarding the steamer Marguerite and being escorted by the porter of the hotel where he boarded.

As the port of Rio was blockaded, owing to the principally being in a state of siege and yellow fever had broken out, there was nothing left for Detective Murray but to return home. Even had he gone to Rio he could have done nothing, as there is no communication with the city at present.

The second notable event is the practical repudiation of Lord Salisbury's leadership by his own party in the House of Commons. His uncompromising attitude towards the Parliament of South America, one by one, being rejected with hardly an influential voice raised in his favor by either a Tory or a Unionist member. It is difficult to believe that his prestige can survive such a blow.

Gladsstone's Resignation Called For. The third, and perhaps the most important event, was the resignation of Mr. Gladstone to resign the leadership of the Liberal party, and to effect the movement for "ending" the House of Lords, which the Chronicle has been the first to suggest.

On the 17th of October, 1892, the Argentine Republic reported the extradition of Aitken, who had been seen at Burlington, Vt., the night of his disappearance and an attempt was made by friends to establish the report, equally indistinctly circulated, that he had committed suicide.

Whether Aitken took this steamship or crossed the Andes to Buenos Ayres could not be ascertained. Murray decided to go to Argentina by way of the Cordilleras.

This necessitated an eight day trip, most of the distance across the mountains being encompassed on the back of a mule.

He had for fellow travelers Ernest Carro, a town in the Argentine Republic, and Maurice de Jolly, a Parisian steamboat manager.

While en route across the mountains Detective Murray had the misfortune to lose a valuable gold watch. The watch fell from his hands and was smashed to pieces by the feet of the mule he was riding.

On arrival at Buenos Ayres Detective Murray ascertained that there was an extradition treaty between the English Government and Argentina, but as yet it had not been signed by the President of the Argentine Republic.

It was reported that there was to be a clause inserted in the treaty to cover the case of Jabez Spencer Bluff, M.P., the president of the famous "Bluff" Co. of England, who fled after involving his friends to the extent of $30,000,000.

A town in the Argentine Republic, which is the capital of the province of that name. Bluff was brought to Buenos Ayres, but was liberated and subsequently fled to Bolivia, where he was still in hiding when Detective Murray left.

San Defector McCrae of St. Kitts. While in Buenos Ayres Mr. Murray saw Senor Don Enrique M. Read, a festive gentleman, whose baptismal name was A. M. Murray. Mr. Murray was manager of the Security Loan and Savings Company of St. Catherine and when in September, 1891, he left St. Kitts for Buenos Ayres he took with him $30,000 of the company's money, and, it is said, a charming black-eyed widow. Since then Mr. Murray has not been known in St. Kitts.

On the 17th of October, 1892, the Argentine Republic reported the extradition of Aitken, who had been seen at Burlington, Vt., the night of his disappearance and an attempt was made by friends to establish the report, equally indistinctly circulated, that he had committed suicide.

Whether Aitken took this steamship or crossed the Andes to Buenos Ayres could not be ascertained. Murray decided to go to Argentina by way of the Cordilleras.

This necessitated an eight day trip, most of the distance across the mountains being encompassed on the back of a mule.

He had for fellow travelers Ernest Carro, a town in the Argentine Republic, and Maurice de Jolly, a Parisian steamboat manager.

While en route across the mountains Detective Murray had the misfortune to lose a valuable gold watch. The watch fell from his hands and was smashed to pieces by the feet of the mule he was riding.

On arrival at Buenos Ayres Detective Murray ascertained that there was an extradition treaty between the English Government and Argentina, but as yet it had not been signed by the President of the Argentine Republic.

It was reported that there was to be a clause inserted in the treaty to cover the case of Jabez Spencer Bluff, M.P., the president of the famous "Bluff" Co. of England, who fled after involving his friends to the extent of $30,000,000.

A town in the Argentine Republic, which is the capital of the province of that name. Bluff was brought to Buenos Ayres, but was liberated and subsequently fled to Bolivia, where he was still in hiding when Detective Murray left.

San Defector McCrae of St. Kitts. While in Buenos Ayres Mr. Murray saw Senor Don Enrique M. Read, a festive gentleman, whose baptismal name was A. M. Murray. Mr. Murray was manager of the Security Loan and Savings Company of St. Catherine and when in September, 1891, he left St. Kitts for Buenos Ayres he took with him $30,000 of the company's money, and, it is said, a charming black-eyed widow. Since then Mr. Murray has not been known in St. Kitts.

On the 17th of October, 1892, the Argentine Republic reported the extradition of Aitken, who had been seen at Burlington, Vt., the night of his disappearance and an attempt was made by friends to establish the report, equally indistinctly circulated, that he had committed suicide.

Whether Aitken took this steamship or crossed the Andes to Buenos Ayres could not be ascertained. Murray decided to go to Argentina by way of the Cordilleras.

This necessitated an eight day trip, most of the distance across the mountains being encompassed on the back of a mule.

He had for fellow travelers Ernest Carro, a town in the Argentine Republic, and Maurice de Jolly, a Parisian steamboat manager.

While en route across the mountains Detective Murray had the misfortune to lose a valuable gold watch. The watch fell from his hands and was smashed to pieces by the feet of the mule he was riding.

On arrival at Buenos Ayres Detective Murray ascertained that there was an extradition treaty between the English Government and Argentina, but as yet it had not been signed by the President of the Argentine Republic.

It was reported that there was to be a clause inserted in the treaty to cover the case of Jabez Spencer Bluff, M.P., the president of the famous "Bluff" Co. of England, who fled after involving his friends to the extent of $30,000,000.

A town in the Argentine Republic, which is the capital of the province of that name. Bluff was brought to Buenos Ayres, but was liberated and subsequently fled to Bolivia, where he was still in hiding when Detective Murray left.

San Defector McCrae of St. Kitts. While in Buenos Ayres Mr. Murray saw Senor Don Enrique M. Read, a festive gentleman, whose baptismal name was A. M. Murray. Mr. Murray was manager of the Security Loan and Savings Company of St. Catherine and when in September, 1891, he left St. Kitts for Buenos Ayres he took with him $30,000 of the company's money, and, it is said, a charming black-eyed widow. Since then Mr. Murray has not been known in St. Kitts.

On the 17th of October, 1892, the Argentine Republic reported the extradition of Aitken, who had been seen at Burlington, Vt., the night of his disappearance and an attempt was made by friends to establish the report, equally indistinctly circulated, that he had committed suicide.

Whether Aitken took this steamship or crossed the Andes to Buenos Ayres could not be ascertained. Murray decided to go to Argentina by way of the Cordilleras.

This necessitated an eight day trip, most of the distance across the mountains being encompassed on the back of a mule.

He had for fellow travelers Ernest Carro, a town in the Argentine Republic, and Maurice de Jolly, a Parisian steamboat manager.

While en route across the mountains Detective Murray had the misfortune to lose a valuable gold watch. The watch fell from his hands and was smashed to pieces by the feet of the mule he was riding.

Minister, who already had correspondence from Foreign Minister Lord Rosebery in reference to the case. He communicated at once with the Secretary for Foreign Affairs in the Peruvian Government and as a result Mr. Murray was at once put in communication with Col. Manuel P. de Luna, Asst. Secy. of the Peruvian Legation in Lima.

As none of the Peruvians speak English, the Minister instructed Murray to go to Callao and get Mr. Wilton to come with him to Lima to interpret to the officials. This was done and an official was issued from the State Department commanding any or all officials in the Republic of Peru to arrest and detain Aitken.

Mr. Murray then called at the South American branch of the race horse of New York and Manager Holcomb promised to do all he could to assist. Shown the photograph of the accused he remarked: "Your man is here. I have seen him myself several times in the street."

Holcomb then gave Mr. Murray several letters, including one to the Peruvian Incorporated Company (Limited), President Dawkins, an Englishman, and his company assumed the track debt of the Government, and took their mines, railroads and lands as security.

A visit to President Dawkins showed that the President had been up at Callao on the steamer with him from Callao to Molando. He sent for Superintendent Aitken of the Peruvian railroads who also recognized Aitken from his photograph, and stated that he had seen him frequently.

The photograph was shown next to a list of the officials of the road, several of whom also recognized the photograph. Manager E. J. Frew of the silver mines at Chalapala stated that Aitken had been up at the mines, which are located on the Andes 100 miles from Lima.

Mr. Evans, a street broker, stated that he had seen Aitken daily in Lima and conversed with him. Aitken stated that he was anxious to return to an English school, and Evans informed Evans that he had not met with much success and intended to leave for Valparaiso. Probably a dozen or so in all recognized Aitken from the photograph as a man they had seen.

Mr. Murray heard that Aitken on leaving Lima had disembarked at Iquique. He took a steamer bound for that place, but in order to make sure Aitken had not disembarked at any other port he called at Pisco, Mollando, Arica and Pasque. On arrival at Iquique he learned that the man had been there in company with another Englishman, also supposed to be a defaulter, had outstayed there for several hours during the detention of the steamer. A week later, on the arrival of the steamer, Murray proceeded to Valparaiso, calling at Cobija, Bolivia, Antofagasta, Caldera and Coquimbo en route.

On arrival at Valparaiso he conferred with the British consul and the Valparaiso house of Grace Bros. of New York, the latter detesting Aitken, and best posted in Lima as to his possible assistance. After several days' search Murray discovered where Aitken had been taking his meals.

He established at a western restaurant in order to substantiate clues obtained, proceeded to Santiago to confer with British Consul J. G. Kennedy and the Minister for Foreign Relations. The latter directed him to Signor Bacanann, his deputy. After a lengthy talk Signor Bacanann stated that the Government would not surrender the fugitive, as there was no treaty between England and Chile.

While willing to resign, Aitken was highly respected throughout the County of Simcoe. He was very musical, and spent much of his time at the piano, composing as he went along.

Like many others, Aitken was tempted to speculate to increase his stock, when the market went against him he used the funds of depositors, and finally resorted to forgery.

On August 2, 1892, Aitken disappeared. The Bank of Hamilton, which held about $20,000 worth of his paper, sent an inspector to Tottenham to examine his books.

But Aitken had saved the books and notes, and he had gone carefully and thoroughly over the books himself, and opposite every genuine note had marked the word "good," so that the total amount of the forgeries was at once apparent.

Traces to Prove He Had Committed Suicide. Before leaving Aitken had cleaned out the vaults and the depositors, of whom there were many, lost every dollar of the funds they had entrusted to him.

On the 17th of October, 1892, the Argentine Republic reported the extradition of Aitken, who had been seen at Burlington, Vt., the night of his disappearance and an attempt was made by friends to establish the report, equally indistinctly circulated, that he had committed suicide.

Whether Aitken took this steamship or crossed the Andes to Buenos Ayres could not be ascertained. Murray decided to go to Argentina by way of the Cordilleras.

This necessitated an eight day trip, most of the distance across the mountains being encompassed on the back of a mule.

He had for fellow travelers Ernest Carro, a town in the Argentine Republic, and Maurice de Jolly, a Parisian steamboat manager.

While en route across the mountains Detective Murray had the misfortune to lose a valuable gold watch. The watch fell from his hands and was smashed to pieces by the feet of the mule he was riding.

On arrival at Buenos Ayres Detective Murray ascertained that there was an extradition treaty between the English Government and Argentina, but as yet it had not been signed by the President of the Argentine Republic.

It was reported that there was to be a clause inserted in the treaty to cover the case of Jabez Spencer Bluff, M.P., the president of the famous "Bluff" Co. of England, who fled after involving his friends to the extent of $30,000,000.

A town in the Argentine Republic, which is the capital of the province of that name. Bluff was brought to Buenos Ayres, but was liberated and subsequently fled to Bolivia, where he was still in hiding when Detective Murray left.

San Defector McCrae of St. Kitts. While in Buenos Ayres Mr. Murray saw Senor Don Enrique M. Read, a festive gentleman, whose baptismal name was A. M. Murray. Mr. Murray was manager of the Security Loan and Savings Company of St. Catherine and when in September, 1891, he left St. Kitts for Buenos Ayres he took with him $30,000 of the company's money, and, it is said, a charming black-eyed widow. Since then Mr. Murray has not been known in St. Kitts.

On the 17th of October, 1892, the Argentine Republic reported the extradition of Aitken, who had been seen at Burlington, Vt., the night of his disappearance and an attempt was made by friends to establish the report, equally indistinctly circulated, that he had committed suicide.

Whether Aitken took this steamship or crossed the Andes to Buenos Ayres could not be ascertained. Murray decided to go to Argentina by way of the Cordilleras.

This necessitated an eight day trip, most of the distance across the mountains being encompassed on the back of a mule.

He had for fellow travelers Ernest Carro, a town in the Argentine Republic, and Maurice de Jolly, a Parisian steamboat manager.

While en route across the mountains Detective Murray had the misfortune to lose a valuable gold watch. The watch fell from his hands and was smashed to pieces by the feet of the mule he was riding.

On arrival at Buenos Ayres Detective Murray ascertained that there was an extradition treaty between the English Government and Argentina, but as yet it had not been signed by the President of the Argentine Republic.

It was reported that there was to be a clause inserted in the treaty to cover the case of Jabez Spencer Bluff, M.P., the president of the famous "Bluff" Co. of England, who fled after involving his friends to the extent of $30,000,000.

A town in the Argentine Republic, which is the capital of the province of that name. Bluff was brought to Buenos Ayres, but was liberated and subsequently fled to Bolivia, where he was still in hiding when Detective Murray left.

San Defector McCrae of St. Kitts. While in Buenos Ayres Mr. Murray saw Senor Don Enrique M. Read, a festive gentleman, whose baptismal name was A. M. Murray. Mr. Murray was manager of the Security Loan and Savings Company of St. Catherine and when in September, 1891, he left St. Kitts for Buenos Ayres he took with him $30,000 of the company's money, and, it is said, a charming black-eyed widow. Since then Mr. Murray has not been known in St. Kitts.

On the 17th of October, 1892, the Argentine Republic reported the extradition of Aitken, who had been seen at Burlington, Vt., the night of his disappearance and an attempt was made by friends to establish the report, equally indistinctly circulated, that he had committed suicide.

Whether Aitken took this steamship or crossed the Andes to Buenos Ayres could not be ascertained. Murray decided to go to Argentina by way of the Cordilleras.