

We had hoped, Mr. Chairman, that within the next few months it will be possible to convene a group of experts, such as those who met at Geneva in the last few months, who would study control techniques and control devices that would prevent the possibility of surprise attack. With that hope and the statements yesterday of the United States and the United Kingdom with respect to their proposals to the U.S.S.R. and the unanimous decision of the emergency general session of the General Assembly, I feel better about the international situation than I have felt since I became a member of this House. But words will not be enough.
