Mr. Rowell then took up the question what would happen if Canada refused to approve of the treaty. The first thing, he said, would be a change of government in this country, then if the British government ratified the treaty and made it binding on Canada without Canada's comsent, two courses would be open, either Canada would have to submit and become a mere colony or she would have to declare her independence.

he was here to support the resolution of the prime minister and to give his cordial approval to the peace treaty and the covenant of the league of nations. The creation of the league sounded the death knell of secret diplomacy. Hereafter international questions would be discussed in an open forum and many wars would be prevented and grievances redressed the force of an enlightened inter-

Mr. Maclean said he felt it his duty, however, to make some comment upon the so-called new status of Canada as a nation. "I am a Canadian," he continued. "I love my country. I have no other country, but I am unable to give assent to the proposition that Canada is a sovereign nation. She cannot be a sovereign nation until she has power to declare war and conclude peace; to send ambassadors and to receive them; to amend her constitution and interpret her own laws.
