The Grand Naval Review at Portsmouth—the Monarch's Table and Society Manners—the Day and the Night—the English Ships and their Names.

[Correspondence of the N. Y. Tribune.]

LONDON, June 24.

It was midnight, and the dinner party had not yet ended. In fact, life in London seems to consist of unlimited dining. I have arrived at a state of mind when I can't tell where one dinner ends and another begins. Owen Meredith is right. Here

"One may live without love; what is passion but pining?
But where is the man that can live without dining?"

There were no bores at this particular dinner. There were present a Russian as handsome as he is distinguished, who told me how he read the Tribune constantly far away in the wilds of Moscow, baronets and M. P.'s who had travelled in America, and wanted to go back because the women were so charming—fair women, and an American by the singular name of Mark Twain. Mr. Twain in endeavoring to instil civilization into the Shah by sitting on the floor and playing draw poker, and says that his august pupil makes wonderful progress in this great American game, and will soon be able to play against the American Minister or the brilliant editor of the Louisville Courier-Journal, who now pines in May Fair for a partner worthy of his deal. I said it was midnight, and we were talking about the "diamant Prince of Persia," as he is called by the mobs. I say "mobs" because I am in England. If I were at home I should say "the people," but here we always call the people "a mob." "I never was so ashamed of myself as I was to-day," confessed an agreeable M. P. "For two hours I stood on a ginger-beer barrel in order to see the Shah. See him I did. He looks like a crafty Parsee merchant, and fine fools we are making of ourselves." "Bother the Shah," exclaimed one dignified looker-on, "why I thought he was gilded all over; and the brute has no manners." "No manners, and very bad taste," remarked another. But he is improving. At St. Petersburg his sportive attendants amused themselves by cutting the flowers out of the palace carpets, and the heads out of portraits hanging on the walls. Their master patronized the Czar, and told him to go on his present course. He, the "King of Kings, approved."

"Ah, but the banquet at Berlin must have been screaming fun," chimed in the Baronet. "The Shah eats with his fingers, and whenever he disliked a dish he took the food out of his mouth and threw it under the table. Picture the dismay of those about him. Here, too, he first drank champagne, and became screwed, whereupon Lord Russel turned to the French Ambassador, saying: "It appears that the Shah is fond of French wine.' C'est bien naturel, instantly replied the Ambassador,' dans la unit tous les chats sonts gris.'" (This is the neatest double pun I ever heard, and undoubtedly originated with Lord Russell, who is one of the wittiest of Englishmen.) "The Shah approves of Kaiser William, but disliked the Empress, and, on taking leave of her husband, expressed great surprise that she should be allowed to exist. 'I advise you to get rid of that old Augusta,' were the Shah's last words at Berlin." "Our king," interposed a noted Belgian, "was excessively nervous about entertaining the Persian horde. Obliged to put beds in some of the palace drawing rooms, he feared the destruction of valuable paintings and furniture, but beyond dirt did not realize his expectations. The King of Kings behaved well enough. His followers had a mania for driving. In Persia they always ride. Once in a carriage they would refuse to get out, insisting upon being driven from morning until night, in consequence of which the royal horses are almost dead."

These charming stories gave me an appetite for the Shah. I had already been drawn to him by his cleverness in disposing of mourning. When the news reached him at Berlin of the death of his mother, he, King of Kings, sent home the three Shahesses, and decreed that the royal grief should be postponed until his return to Persia, which fact reminds me of the Yankee woman who, upon being told at dinner of her husband's death, exclaimed, "just wait until I've done eating, and I'll show you some tall crying." They say that the three Shahesses are to have their heads chopped off because of unveiling their faces in public. Desirous of beholding the man who can chop off his wives' heads and yet be received by that "model wife and mother," Victoria, who is extremely particular about morals, I listened to a parliamentary siren and promised to go to Spithead the next morning to witness the Naval Review. It was the next morning when I promised, so that as I arose at 5 o'clock a. m. it is a pleasant fiction to suppose I went to bed at all. Upon finding myself in a parliamentary train, occupying a carriage with a member of the Government, one of its most violent opponents, a Conservative and a radical, all hobnobbing as blandly as though they had never called one another names, I felt extremely obliged to the Shah for being the cause of bringing together a happy family for my benefit. Think of the "reg'lar knock-down of Intellect" on that train, and what would have become of the country had it gone to everlasting smash! This intellect, however, did not seem to be appreciated by the multitude assembled at Portsmouth, for when one lusty Britisher asked which of us was the Shah, and received answer that we were the Commons, he irreverently exclaimed, "The House of Commons be blowed."

Of course there were detentions, but we finally arrived at Southsea, and, walking through the dock-yards, passed the awning which was to shelter the Shah en route to the yacht Victoria and Albert. Perhaps it was accidental, but the greater part of the passage-way was covered with the American flag, which I saluted standing and in silence. Then we boarded the fine transport steamship Tamar, consecrated to the Commons, and sat down to a breakfast provided gratis by the nation. How much the Shah will cost the nation I know not, nor does the nation; but I shall be much surprised if the poorer classes do not find a grievance and turn it to good account. I should if I were one of them. Steaming away from our moorings we lazily drifted off the shore waiting for the coming of the illustrious personages. Here ordinary folk are called "persons," and royal folk are called "personages." I like these distinctions. They keep classes apart and foster that noblest of all traits, flunkeyism. I like to see journalists pandering to this sort of thing by publicly writing up what they privately ridicule and despise. It proves the nobility of English journalism and how little its professors merit the contempt with which they are regarded by the "personages" about whom their pens cringe and lie.

Personages excepted, the sight was beautiful. The weather did its prettiest; never have I seen so sunny, so cloudless a day in Merry England. The water was in an oriental mood, unruffled as the Shah. Before us lay the Isle of Wight, behind us the sloping shores of Southsea with their gay groups of people and fluttering standards. Between, rode at anchor the largest fleet in the world, represented by 44 ships and gun-boats, 23 of which cost no less than £2,700,000! It was difficult in the distance to realize either fleet or cost, for the white gun-boats looked like tin toys launched upon the water, and the bigger turret-ships resembled either American steamboats shorn of everything but machinery, or the washing-houses anchored on the Rhine. Yachts danced about in nervous expectation, and I was highly entertained by a small steam-yacht having on board a noble lord and an imposing M. P., the latter of whom stood at the helm and put his craft through her paces, taking very good care never to be beyond the range of observation. The noble lord struck attitudes, he posed beautifully, there was an air of abandon about his noble legs that I never saw equaled. The members of the New York Yacht Squadron couldn't approach it if they tried. "He's jackall to the Prince of Wales," said a vulgar Commoner, which accounted for the distinction of those legs. But a truce to jackalls. Listen, it was the royal salute. For five minutes my ears were overwhelmed with such thunder as they never heard before, and could not long bear without ensuing deafness. Thunder, thunder, everywhere. The entire fleet was enveloped in smoke, and as it gradually lifted, every ship seemed to have been kissed by a snow-white, curling cloud, that floated over the water and finally melted away. The dressing of flags brought out fine color, and the manning of the yards made the rigging alive with white ants. Now the royal yacht Victoria and Albert took the lead, and we of the Tamar, waiting for the House of Lords to take precedence, humbly brought up the rear of a truly majestic procession. What can I say of the wonderful fleet around which we slowly sailed, saving that it told the tale of England's sovereignty of the seas and the genius of her people. The lion and the unicorn should be superseded by horse and dolphin, for Englishmen are really at home on both, and are not likely to be beaten on either. It is a strange dolphin with which naval architecture now defies the world. The beauty of wooden vessels has passed away. Pretty, graceful lines, marvellous rigging, snow-white sails have had their day, and now sullen, black, outlandish, indescribable, shapeless monsters lie low in the water, and are known by such fiendish names as Devastation, Hecate, Hydra, Gorgon, Bruiser, Blazer, Bustard, and Cracker, which, considering their sex, are strange indeed. The next christening will probably be Satan, Hell-Fire, and the Day of Judgement. Far up on the summit of the masts of Hercules two sailors stood at ease, apparently holding on to nothing, yet remaining as long as we were in sight, and every ship denoted discipline that ought to impress a Persian monarch with wonder, if wonder enters the Oriental composition. We turned and returned. Yachts, sail boats, row-boats skimmed about, bits of bright cloth dotted the water, another fearful cannonading showed the power of the ugly monsters that have swallowed so many pounds sterling. I was not astonished to hear that many of the officers and men on board the iron-clads are deaf, and congratulated myself upon occupying no such honorable position. In more than one sense the British navy turns a deaf ear to all creation.

Again we were in port, arriving first and awaiting the coming of the Shah. The shore was alive with humanity standing on tiptoe for a glimpse of one small man. At last the royal yacht passed us, and everybody glared at the good-looking Persian standing on the paddle-box. "That's him!" exclaimed some honorable Commoner, totally regardless of grammar. I know better. The man on exhibition was much too good-looking for a Shah. And so it turned out. Nobody who went to see the Shah saw him, but everybody witnessed a noble naval review of a great nation on the loveliest of days, and was glad that an insignificant Persian should have been the cause of a most significant and totally unprecedented display. "Well, what do you think of it all?" asked the M. P. to whom I owed the pleasure now recorded. "I think there is something magnificent in you Englishmen, and I am glad that we are cousins." "Well, that is a concession," answered the M. P., and with a laugh we went ashore.
