Trench Work as Executed by 215th Battalion in City

All the Difficulties to Be Encountered at the Front of War Are Surmounted By the Soldiers In Winter Training Here.

The past two weeks since the arrival of the 215th second Brant battalion in the city have been almost entirely devoted by Lt.-Col. Morris and his staff in effecting an organization upon which the operations of the battalion might be based during their stay here for the next few months. The securing of quarters for the troops, which might be available for occupation for drill purposes in stormy weather, the work of completing arrangements for physical drills in the Y. M. C. A. which would not interfere with the regular classes and the innumerable details involved in the transference of so many men, have been finally concluded, and the battalion have settled down to the winter's work.

As the training acquired here will in all probability, be the last before going overseas, it is being conducted in a thorough, extensive and efficient manner.

One of the prime essentials in the training given here, is that it resembles as far as possible the more strenuous experiences which will have to be faced in the future, and perhaps the most requisite phase of war service with which the men should be familiar, is trench fighting. It was therefore with the idea of imparting instruction in this respect that a suitable location was sought in which trenches might be constructed and practice in trench warfare conducted. Several sites were considered, but the one which met with the most general approval was the one formerly occupied by the Workman brickyard. The characteristics of this place complied most closely with those desired, in that sand, clay and gravel soil were all present, as well as rolling land and an undulating surface were all to be found there, and would present identically the same difficulties as those encountered at the battlefront.

When the ngotiations by which the use of the property was gained, were completed, the entire project was placed in charge of Major Snider, under whose supervision the trenches have been laid out and constructed. The two companies of the battalion work on alternate days marching to the grounds at eight o'clock in the morning and remaining until four in the afternoon. They cease operations at twelve o'clock when their meals are brought to them in the field kitchen from the mess room on Dalhousie street. After an interval of rest, lasting until about half past one, work is again resumed and continued until four o'clock, when accompanied by the bugle or brass band, the men march back to barracks.

Work was commenced on Monday morning, October 23rd, and continued as steadily as possible, being interrupted only by rainy weather or some other unavoidable circumstance. During the week one line of trench extending a little over a hundred yards in length, following a snaky course in an easterly and westerly direction, had been constructed. These trenches in reality may be anywhere as deep as sixteen feet, but those at the brick yard are an average depth of eight feet and two feet six inches in width. They are known as the supervision, traffic, or travel trenches at the front and it is in this line that the soldier lives. At intervals of fifty five feet communications connect with the first line trenches, which differ greatly from those above mentioned. Forty-five feet of these first line trenches have been built fifteen or twenty feet in advance of the second line. They are four feet deep and three feet wide, being used principally for bombing and firing. Instead of a devious route, a zig-zag course is followed, this being done in order that should a bomb explode all the men occupying that line would not suffer injury. It is the intention of Major Snider to have his line extended to the same length as the first line which will likely be done this week. There will also be another trench in the rear of the other two when the operations have been finally completed, making three lines in all. In addition to the above constructions which have been completed up to the present, an exhibition bombing trench of about fifty yards in length has been constructed also at the western end of the ground.

This result has been attained in five days only, being subject to several interruptions which caused delay in progress to some extent.

A suspension bridge, over the pond in the huge excavation from which clay has been removed when the manufacture of bricks was in progress, will be built in the near future under the direction of Major Jackson. Rifle pits are also to be dug in the summit of the elevation facing the trenches from the opposite side of the pond and the general effect of the district resembles a modern battle-ground.

Try to see "The Battle of the Somme" pictures at The Colonial, Thursday, Friday or on Saturday, in the afternoon. Immense crowds are assured for the evenings.
