the victim was. No subtle deductions photographs taken of the dead man, and sent them broadcast throughout the world.

Meantime, the detective examined the swamp where the body had been ound. Or his-hands and knees amid the brambles and the mud he searched every inch of ground slowly and painfully. Only after three long and tedious searches was his patience rewarded. Half-buried in the mud he found a cigar holder with an amber mouthpiece marked "F. J. B."

It was a slight enough thing, but it was at least a start. Murray now began a steady and patient line of in the vicinity of the swamp, and while he was engaged upon this a Mr. Reginald Birchall and his wife ap-plied to see the body of the murdered They identified it is that of a ing man named Benwell, who had en a fellow-passenger of theirs on Britannic, which had recently arthe newspapers.

Murray dropped his local inquiries, and hastened to see these new witnesses. He met them at an hotel. "The gentleman," he said, "was dressed in perfect taste. He was

The lady stood by the window looking out. She was a slender, pleasant-faced blonde, a bit weary about the eyes, but evidently a woman of refinement." Mr. Birchall was anxious to help e detective—a little too anxious, Murray felt. According to him Benwell was a mere shipboard acquaintance with whom he and his wife had become triendly. They had travelled as far as the Niagara Falls together, and there Benwell had left them to go to London, Ontario. He had left some of his luggage at the Falls, and had written to Birchall to have it forwarded.

Murray Takes a Risk. Murray was a judge of men. As his quiet, penetrating questions were answered with ready suavity, he became convinced that this man was lying. Why, he could not tell himself. Why should these people, if they were associated with the murder, have come forward to identify the body? He permitted no sign of his suspicion to show in his face or manner. Adroitly he parried a suggestion that he and the Birchalls should go on to Toronto together, and made an engagement to meet them at a later day at the Customs House at Niagara Falls. Murray's first call after leaving him was to a telegraph-office, where he sent a wire to the police at Niagara Falls, describing Birchall and his wife, who were returning that day. "Shadow this man," he said. "Do not arrest him unless he tries to cross the river to the States. I will be there Sunday night."

The detective made his way to London, Ontario. There the most minute inquiries satisfied him that Benwell had not been seen there. In that respect, at least, Birchall had been lying. It is a far cry from proving that a person has lied to proving that he has committed murder Nevertheless, acting upon some intinct, Murray took a risk. He went over to Niagara Falls and arrested Birchall and his wife.

The Woman's Last Word

Browning, the poet, told this story about Fanny Kemble:-"It seems that after Fanny Kemble had separated from her husband she heard that he had lost a great deal of money. Always impulsive, she rushed over to America to offer him financial assistance. When she was shown into his room he rose stiffly and said:

'Madam, to what am I indebted for the honor of this visit?" Enraged at his formality, she exclaimed. "I only came to tell you how much I hate you!' and flounced out, and started back across the Atlantic without a
