CHAPTER XXV.

Reparation. It was not often that Tredcroft was

It was not often that Tredcroft was taken by surprise, but when he saw the name of John Russell on the bit of pasteboard between his fingers he started, blinked his eyes and looked again. His first thoughts were "What can he want with me?" His brow furrowed. "The girl, of course, but he mustn't—oh, well, let me get through the interview." All this had passed through his mind like lightning. Apparently he was still puzzling over the name on the card. The butler was waiting at a discreet distance.

"I will see the gentleman," he said.
"Hem—sir! He's in the hall."
"Hang it, man, why do you leave a guest of mine to cool his heels in that uncivilized manner? Take him into the happiness in store for you—for us all. I only ask you to have faith in my promises. Now you must excuse me for a little while."

His movements were quick and sure; his uplifted head, his ringing volce, told of buoyancy and the joy of living. The old familiar Julian Trederoft was gone— the Julian Trederoft in whose brighter

Yuletide Fairy Tales 🐶

If ever there was a musical instrument saw floating in the air above her head, which seems to have fairies in it, it is her little three-year-old son.

Of course this made mamma play all so I will say at once that our pits which seems to have lairies in it, it is the violin.

It is light and graceful. Its "S"-shaped sound holes are just the place out of which fairies might come when they can do the most good.

It is strings, touched lightly, produce sounds that are eerle, fairylike. Even the bow, which slips backward and forward across the delicate strings, suggests the land of airy, happly little folk whom we call fairiess.

It is light and graceful. Its "S"-shaped the better, and soon the old Strad was pouring forth notes which made all the boarders in the house gather in the hall to listen.

Mamma stood still, and looking loving-the dingy ceiling, she played as she had not airy, happly little folk whom we call fairiess.

gests the land of airy, happly little folk whom we call fairiess.

And mamma in the big city of Chicago knew all these things. Also she knew how to get the sweetest of notes out of the violin.

So when mamma thought long and hard about her little boy from whom she had been separated for months and months—it seemed YEARS to mamma—she picked up her old Stradivarius, and pacing up and down her little room, began gently to draw the bow across the strings.

And as she played she saw the sturdy form of a broad-shouldered man gradually emerging as if from a cloud behind the boy was resting in his father's arms.

Mamma touched the strings again with the boy, and a shrill little voice spoke to her:

"We have come for you, mamma, dear," It said, "Papa and I are lonesome, too—and perhaps we have been in the old violin all the time, just waiting for you her music brought results. For soon she

"Are you going off your dot?" groaned Corston.

"Tim as cheerful as a cricket, sir; used to being in tight corners, and ann ont in the least cast down, although I croak like Poe's immortal raven! Now, you sit still, and I'll have a go at that signal "I'll try and pray a little," Corston murmured. "I've always prided myself upon being a religious man, but I've never been a Christian. If I'm spared I'll make a start this very day. What's that!" he almost screamed. The signal was being answered, and he fell back in a dead faint.

When he revived Barker was reading a message which had been sent down from the top at the end of a cord. There was a basket, too, a wicker affair such as workmen use to carry their food in, and it contained a bottle of cold tea and some bread and butter.

"Wake up, Corston!" Barker cried, hysterically. "Drink, man, drink! Here you are. Now listen. Your people have deserted the pits, but the signal was heard by one of our men—Trederoft's men. He knows about our disappearance, and guesses that one of us is living, anyway. Now I'm going to send up an answer-tell him we're both as jolly as sandboys, and having a high old time. But we're tired of too much of a good thing, and want to see daylight."

Scratch, scratch, raced the pencil over a page of Mr. Corston's pocketbook—the second message to the world above from that same book—and soon the basket was whirling upwards.

"Now for some breakfast." Barker said joyously. "Eat and drink, sir. Never before did I see a more glorlous spread of victuals."
