She resolved that she would investigate the affair all by herself.

The scene that met Alice's eyes when she entered the house was an appalling one. The Bolshevists had taken full possession. They were hearly all women, and they were wandering about with cut glass bowls and family heirlooms and carving sets and sofa cushions under their arms. The house had been absolutely looted. The pictures were down and the rugs were up, and all the chairs in the dining-room were piled on the table. Alice shuddered as she thought of the fate of the owner of the house.
