THREE LIBERAL LEADERS MESSRS. BLAKE, MACKENZIE AND

CHARLTON AT PARKDALE.

A Night of Political Talk in the Village Town Hall—Independence Variously Hinted at.

Speaking of political meetings, there is no reason why the rooms where they are held should not be neatly arranged as was the Parking of political meetings. The point jail and court house committee to-day awarded the following contracts:

the corner of the platform a life-like bust of the late and great George Brown looked seenely on his old-time associates. Speaking of political meeting, there is no reason why the rooms where they are held should not be neatly arranged as was the Parkdale hall last night. It is too often the practice to hold-them in stuffy, tobacco-smoked dens. The chair was occupied by T. A. Thompson, vice-president of the society, in the absence of J. S. Lockie, the president. In addition to the speakers, thor. T. W. Anglin, G. W. Badgerow, M.P.P., and Reeve McMath occupied seats on the platform.

Mr. Charlton was the first speaker, and held the boards for an hour and a half. He was loudly applauded when he came forth. The first and greatest part of his address was devoted to the government's Pacific railway policy, alleged extravagance with public money and increasing debt, and when the speaker mentioned independence a cheer such as was not heard during the meeting went up from the audience. But they were disappointed, for the speaker after mentioning the word, added, "But I am not going to say anything about that." He then assured his hearers that the reform party had a policy, and he enumerated several of the planks. Their first plank was that Canada should possess the right to make her own commercial treaties. The next was that our Canadian senate should be radically reformed, as it did not in any manner or form reflect public sentiment. Mr. Mackenow were a little further when it came to his turn. "I would," he declared, "tear it (the senate) to pieces if I had the power." [Loud applause]. Mr. Charlton's next planks were that the time had arrived when the public debt of Canada should be decreased, the expenditure of public money should be curtailed; the duty on the necessaries of life (more particularly coal) should be removed; the workingmen should he notested. He would protect removed; the workingmen should be protected. He would protect them by doing away with assisted passwas in power he put a stop to thimble-rigging in the letting of public contracts. Then the reform party had a sacred re-spect for provincial rights and would pro-starving on the verge of bankruptcy, a legacy of tory rule, "although," the speaker said, "they both commenced at the time with equal chances." [Apover an hour he glorified the purity of the over an hour he glorified the purity of the Ontario reform government, and then adverted to the orange order. "My brother orangemen," [great laughter] said Mr. Ryan, "stood up parliament after parliament for Sir John, and then when they went to him for incorporation the old man was as mum as a mouse and would not say a word, while the leader of the great liberal party had stood bravely up in parliamal party had stood bravely up in parliament. ment and gave his reasons why he voted against the orange hill." The speaker then drifted briefly into the independence vein and the audience got apparently well worked up. "There was no parently well worked up. "There was no denying," he said, "that the day would denying," he said, "that the day would come, it must come just as sure as a son leaves his father's house to make one for himself, when the question of independence would be discussed and talked about all over the dominion. And when that day did come he would proclaim boldly for independence in preference to selling ourselves over to the United States, as the conservative party say we want to do."

The speaker assured his hearers over and over again that independence would be a live question in the future.

Mr. Blake was loudly called for, but he did not have a great deal to say, but he did not forget to say a few very kind words for Mr. Mackenzie's policy and administration, and a few of the opposite kind about the government of the day and their about the government of the day and their mode of running the country. He addressed himself principally as to the need of better organization in the liberal party and more individual work among its members. He did not believe, with the late John Sandfield Macdonald, that politics should be left to politians. The people should read about them, learn about them and talk about them. Mr. Blake then told the audience that he cread both sides of every audience that he read both sides of every question. He read his own party papers and then read the papers of the other party and he managed to get at the truth if he could. [Applause].

Mr. Mackenzie, in response to loud calls,

"I am," he said, "a warm friend of confederation. I have always been one. He loved the dominion, but he could not forget the associations of the motherland. As to severing our connection with the mother country, I would not consider it for one minute." Mr. Mackenzie then said that by good management and organization he had no doubt the liberal party could carry the next election. He concluded by thinking that Sir John was a very bad man with within hearing of the reporter's table, "and also a great ability for power."
