

LEWIS, ALFRED HENRY

Wolfville: illustrated by Frederic Remington.
Crown 8vo., Cloth, $1.25; Paper, 75 cents.

This is a book of fresh and quaint humor. It describes in odd, but not tedious dialect, the doings in a western ranching settlement. The eighteen illustrations by Remington are fully equal to that artist's great reputation.

"It is with relief one turns to another phase of earthly experience in the reminiscences of the 'old cattleman,' in 'Wolfville,' the collection of delightful sketches by Mr. Lewis, just issued by Mr. Morang. The edition is a substantial paper one, with the capital illustrations of Frederic Remington. They are tales of typical Arizonians, with their rough sense of justice, their pride, touchiness of honor, impatience of cant, and tenderness to good women and to children. Here is another atmosphere, not without sin, not without tragedy—where that man is, are these wanting? But one feels the freedom of the life and loves his kind as he is here depicted, grim and natural. It is not possible to denote in a brief review, the rare flavor of the old cattleman's narratives. He is as full of generous sentiment as he is of anecdote, and a humor that, whether he tells of 'obscurities,' or 'nuptials,' or a 'hanging,' or any other exciting event in camp, is quite irresistible. Take, for example, the ordeal to which the cattleman subjected 'Tucson Jennie's' heart. It was the usual thing to identify a citizen by tacking to his name or hers the locality they hailed from. Jennie, who came from Tucson to fry flap-jacks an 'salt-hoss' an 'Missie' Rucker of the 'O. K. Restaurant' 'deal her little gastronomic game,' was so attractive that in less than two weeks half the camp was smitten. 'Of course,' says the old cattleman, 'this yere first frenzy' subsides a whole lot, after a month, but the excitement was high enough to make Wolfville anxious to see all this wild affection settled.'—Toronto Globe.

"This is a somewhat rugged book in rugged phraseology; Wolfville was, however, a rugged hamlet. Its chronicles will be found interesting to many."—Ottawa Journal.

"Those who have read anything from the pen of Alfred Henry Lewis, humorist, will be glad to know that he has published Wolfville. The stories make most interesting reading, and the pictures are by Remington, which means that the book is first-class in every respect."—Hamilton Spectator.

"In Wolfville, by Alfred Henry Lewis, illustrated by Remington, we have a series of sketches illustrative of life in a ranching town, full of fresh and quaint humor, and racy anecdotes."—Quebec Telegraph.

"This is a graphic account of life in a western mining town, after the style of Bret Harte's stories."—Methodist Magazine.

The place which Mr. Mabie has undoubtedly taken in modern criticism has yet to be fully and adequately recognized, but already he has won a large following by his delightful books, and there is abundant evidence of an increasing interest in the literary career of one who has made a niche for himself in the world of letters. Approaching literature, filled equally with reverence for the unbroken vitality of its past and faith in its exhaustless future, and imbued with the virility of our democratic era, Mr. Mabie has inherited the new conception of literature. "Literature," he has said, "is no product of artifice or mechanism; it is a natural growth, its roots are in the heart of man, it is the voice of man's needs and sufferings and hopes." "The measure of a man's power is not to be found in any special gift, but in the depth and richness of his own personality. In its noblest forms literature is essentially a harmonious expression; a man's nature is not broken up into fragments, it expresses itself as a unit. I don't believe a man can be fundamentally bad in his dealings with the life about him and continuously sound in his creative activity. I think that greatness and continuity of production in art depend on the soundness of a man's relation to life." These words give the key to Mr. Mabie's attitude towards life and culture. A full exemplification of it is to be found in the above essays.
