Constantinople and the Turks.

A Constantinople correspondent writes: The climate of Constantinople is not so warm in summer as that of New York, nor as cold in winter. But the south winds here, if they continue any length of time, are very oppressive. Neither is the air so exhilarating as that of America. The manners and customs of the Turks are altogether different from those in America. Here, men go about with bare arms and necks—there the ladies. Here all women wear trousers and ride horse-back (or rather donkey-back)—a straddle, while many men are here seen in petticoats. The American lies in bed with his feet covered and head bare, but the Turk cannot sleep without bundling up his head, and also drawing over it the bed-spread, and at the same time leaving his naked feet entirely exposed. A few days ago I went into a palace which is owned by the sultan. I found that the walls were of the simplest character throughout, while all the ceilings were gorgeously painted. With Americans it is usually the reverse. New Yorkers wash their hands before dinner (or at least ought to); the Turks wash after the meal. Among Americans the males and females of the family dine together and at the same table. Here they always dine apart, the males before the females; for the latter, being looked upon as an altogether inferior order of beings, any unnecessary close contact would be considered highly degrading to their manliness. The Turk, however, possesses one grand redeeming quality: He is scrupulously clean, washing himself, particularly his feet, several times a day.

Almost all the labor of a manual character is here done by donkeys. These patient little animals, sometimes no larger than a sheep, are the carriers, stone and wood-carriers, fruit-carriers, etc. A short time ago, while at Halki, one of the small islands in the Sea of Marmora, which together form the Saratoga, Newport and Long Branch of the wealthy Constantinopolitans, I rode around it, semi-mounted upon the back of one of these little creatures. Several times my misgivings were so great that I was seriously inclined to get off of him. He was so small that I had to draw up my feet to keep them from dragging on the ground. But he took me safely around, and we parted the best of friends, for I gave him a fig, of which donkeys are very fond. He had a soft, low voice, which, by-the-way, is an excellent thing in a donkey.

The Queen's Query.

"Eueas, dear," murmured the beautiful queen of Carthage, as one summer eve, with pensive thought, they wandered on the seaboard shore; "Eueas?" "Speak Queen of the Seas," the goddess-born replied, "speak on, what wiltst thou have?" "Tell me one thing," she said, and her wistful eyes looked up into his like dreams of melting stardlight; "tell me, my good lord, one thing." "One? thou bright-eyed daughter of the stars, a thousand!" replied her hero. "Nay," she whispered, leaning closer to him, and nestling her head upon his breast, so that her lifted eyes might smile and shine upon the bronzed face of the hero, "but one." "Unused a buster," he murmured, quoting from Esop, which he had read when a boy; "ask what thou wilt, and I, by all the gods, will tell you what you seek to know." She was silent for a little space, and then looking up tenderly into his face, sighed softly and said: "If a billy-goat is a butler?" "Eueas said," he and his eyes stood out on his cheek bones, and stared at each other and Queen Dido in rapture. She went on: "Would you call a nauncy-got a butters?" The goddess-born sat him down upon a rock and said he just remembered it was lodge night. He fled. He climbed into the first ship he saw and beat his way to the next port, and Dido never saw him more.—Burlington Hawkeye.

A Cowhiding by Women.

On Monday, says a late issue of a Salt Lake (Utah) paper, one of the young ladies employed at Mr. Colebrook's millinery establishment, received an exceedingly note from W. A. Books, who is well known in this city, inviting her to meet him yesterday evening near St. Mary's school. The girl, knowing his propensities, plotted with four others of her companions to go and give him a dose of "black snake." They went, but it was near the American Hotel where they found their man. Four of the girls, armed each with a good cowhide-whip, secreted themselves in the alley near by, to witness the meeting. He came, and at a convenient time they also came from their hiding place and began a vigorous slashing and belaboring with the whips. He was hit, we understand, once on the head, and once on the legs, when he drew a pretty little white-handled pocket pistol on his feminine tormentors. He didn't use it, however, but turned and fled, and the speed at which he ran would have shamed an antelope. He tore down Second East and Second South, thence west and into the office of our morning contemporary, there to tell his straightforward tale. The excited and indignant ladies followed him into the newspaper office and again insisted upon giving him a thorough cowhiding; but he had taken refuge behind a door, where he was quietly submitted to the fearful fog-blasting which was administered by one of the girls. She read him a list of his misdeeds, and presented a pretty good indictment of Books in general. The girls assert that they had been insulted several times by the fellow, and they took this occasion to settle an old score against him.

The street-car drivers and conductors get heavier salaries than any other set of men in town. They are paid off in nickels and pennies.—Cincinnati Sunday Breakfast Table.

Twenty-nine women were advertised in a recent issue of a Chicago paper as about to preach and conduct religious services on the following Sunday.
