...the promise God has given us shall not be made perfect.

Of course, the words, in their original application, have reference to the contrast between Old and New Testament believers.

Not only, then, first of all, the bond which unites all generations of believers.

These all having been witnessed to, through faith, says the writer. Now, if time were to be given to us as being ever more singular than we sometimes consider it.

Is not this Christianity the destruction of "Christianity" as the true Judaism, and all these people in the past who belonged to it therefore belonged to us?

May I venture to say that there are possible dangers arising from our exhortations, possible corruptions, and stagations.

It is a real danger, that of "definite" doctrinal teaching may be diminished in its relative prominence in the Christian life.

How many of us start for heaven without leaving anything of value? It is as if the arrows of conviction only succeed in driving us to sort our baggage, and throw away what we do not care to carry.
