

destination owing to a mistake in the post office. There was but one opinion expressed regarding the ward and its equipment and that was that nothing better could well be imagined. The cots were placed in position yesterday morning and the children, who hitherto have been scattered all over the hospital, were gathered in, except one or two who were considered too ill to stand the excitement of the crowd at the opening. Several of the little tots were in their beds, others in the part of the room divided off for playing, while one was in the invalid's chair.

The ward, which is spacious and well lighted, has been finished in oak and the walls tinted a light color. An oak fence, the gift of J. W. Woods, divides the room into two parts. The part on the south side is the day nursery for convalescents. Around this part, against the wall, are oak boxes which can be used for seats but which are to contain toys, picture books, etc., when not in use. An oak cabinet contains warm dressing gowns, slippers and stockings for the children to wear while play-
