She held out the paper to him as she spoke, and wonderingly the old man took it and read. But as he did so his face grew stony and rigid, his hands fell powerless by his side, and he sat like one deprived of speech and motion.

'Oh. uncle!" cried Flora again, "save him! oh save your son!"

"Hasio." said he slowly as he rose to seek among his former associates some news of her lost love, but it was almost in vain. At one time she heard he was working in a reinting office "somewhere;" an anothwas a hurried scrap, written in pencil, without date or heading:

"Dear Flora—Thank Heaven you never loved me—I should have broken your heart—I have gone all to the bad — there is no hope of me—I have forged father's name to a bill for £20—thoy tempted me, but that is no excuse. Don't grieve for me—I am not worth it. God bless you and my poor father. I shall never come back sgain." David.

"Would that do you s deal of good?" liteness both, for, after looking at the book for a few minutes; he said, "I think ma'am, it was a Mrs. Dalgetty who sold me that book. She used to let lodgings in this town, and she brought it to meamong several others when she is mot worth it. God bless you and my poor father. I shall never come back gain." David.
