THE LAST AND HIGHEST STAKE.

"Ton'd better give up the game for this evening," said a friend of Tcherestoff. The young officer poured out another giass of thampagne.

"Resitte from the game," he cried, "at the rery moment that my inches returning a shall not leave the table until daylight."

"I pledge myself to do she same," replied Augustinoff.

The gene continued with renewed animation. Such atruggies have a terrible recombiance to duels to the death. Each adversary wetches the other, seeking to digine in his eyes the secret of the next play. Each tries to hide his own thoughthe yields, advances, retreats again; systame, hands tremble. A single mitake would be irreparable. Every play is calouted as a rapidly flung down in order to its concert the adversary. Finally one of the two becomes are reskoned, and sards are rapidly flung down in order to its concert the adversary. Finally one of the two becomes contrasted in feet and the comments. "You cannot play any more; you have lost everything!"
"How do you know?"
"Have you some hidden treasures?"
"Yes, I have hidden treasures?"
And continuing in a whisper, a strangled whisper that barely escaped from his livid lips, he said:

But his voice now trembled like that of his adversary. Emotion choked the words at his throat—they came forth only with difficulty.

He continued:

"Still, I accept only under two conditions. The first is this: My stake is insufficient. I add to it 500,000 roubles, because I cannot add any mere, Secondly, you must have the divorce obtained, taking upon yourself all responsibility for it. The reputation of

"If accept the cenditions," replied Teheresteed, "The first is flattering to my wife; the exceed my generasity."

At the mement of taking up the cards, Augustinest was selzed with a singular nervousness. He seemed fearful to begin the bontest of which the woman he loved was the stake. Was he afraid of losing? Or did he fear a disdainful rejection by the Princess of the terms to which she had any consolously been made a part—a contemptrous refusal stat would annihilate the fruits of victory in his very grasp? All these feelings blended in the tumult of his mind and rebbed him of much of that wenderful resources the stands at the head of the list as exact of colors he had always shewn in ordinary playing.

The game commenced. It then assumed the aspect of a mortal duel, indeed.

A deep silence reigned in the hall. Each held his breath, and nothing could be heard except the dry sound of the cards falling upon one another, like soldiers mortally wounded. From time to time a voice spoke, announcing a point made—then the gliding of the counters marking it. At each play the two adversaries paused, like wrestlers overcome with fatigue and trembling at the thought of defeat. The chances seemed equal, the skill evenly proportionate. A bold but incautious play was finally made by Toheretzoff. It might in other cases have brought victory—it only led to defeat!
