The House of Lords is being pretty generally condemned, and in many cases ridivitle with more encouragement and certainly with less opposition. The World will be

World is not prepared at this modifference between the Senate of the United States and the House of Lords of England, in that the latter is appointed and hereditary, while the American institution is indirectly elective, and therefore representative of the people. But for the House of Lords it has been said, and can be said with reason, that it is free from popular prejudices, and in great crises can rise above popular clamor, and can be a real safeguard when the passions of the people as realised through their representatives might lead to disorder and revolution. We have not, therefore, time to discuss this question on its absolute merits, but we can say without any hesitation that in this particular instance the House of Lords is discharging a highly necessary and responsible duty in compelling Mr. Gladstone, who, through a resort to all the artifices and stratagems of modern political tactics, has been enabled to introduce into Parliament a measure which is in the nature of a revolution and the overturning of the constitution without any hesitation that the nature of a revolution and the overturning of the constitution without any hesitation that the latter is appointed and hereditary, and select men in science, medicine, literature, ablest the departments of human activity. But arranged flower beds. Front and Welling transported the observable of the observing our chief means of support and the great Northwest. He must of a mean of support and the great Northwest. He must of the ferman people better than we do, and the great Northwest. He must of the l public has to be educated as to its merits and demerits; and what has been called the sober second thought of the community has to be taken on the issue. It is for this very purpose that second chambers have been retained in old countries and created in new ones, and this duty the House of Lords is to-day carrying out the House of Lords is to-day carrying out in England in a way in which it has never in England in a way in which it has never in the fact that a rational method of Sunday This Week Until before been more efficiently performed by any second chamber in the world. If the question, after it has been sent to the people, should be decided in favor of Mr. Gladstone's contention, then the House of Lords will by precedent be compelled to accept the measure. But until that endorsation has been received from the people the Mr. T. H. Gilmour, who formerly prac-

the measure. But until that endorsation has been received from the people the Lords are perfectly justified by all past history and by the requirements of all modern parliamentary practice in throwing out the bill.

It is really Mr. Gladstone who is now on trial, not the House of Lords, and he will be on trial for an attempt on his part to override the constitution, namely in adjourning if possible the reference of this question to the people, and in trying to entangle it with other measures which he now brings forward. We have no hesitation in saying that it his constitutional duty to go immediately to the people on this vital issue, and on it alone. And if he fails to do this the violation of the constitution will be on the part of the House of Commons rather than on the part of the House of Commons rather than on the part of the House of Commons rather than on the part of the House of Commons rather than on the part of the House of Commons rather than on the part of the House of Commons rather than on the part of the House of Commons rather than on the part of the House of Commons rather than on the part of the House of Commons rather than on the part of the House of Commons rather than on the part of the House of Commons rather than on the part of the House of Commons rather than on the part of the House of Commons rather than on the part of the House of Commons rather than on the part of the House of Commons rather than on the part of the House of Commons rather than on the part of the House of Commons rather than on the part of the House of Commons rather than on the people on this vital issue, and on it alone. Trot Out Your Project.

Mr. E. A. Macdonald and his friends are pressing their Georgian Bay canal scheme. But just what Mr. Macdonald's Georgian Bay canal scheme is we are at a loss to know. We say to Mr. Macdonald and his friends. Never mind any oratory, never mind any reflections on the bad state of the city of Toronto and what will do her good, or any disquisition on Mr. Macdonald and his enemies, but come straight forward and give us a statement of what the scheme is,

The Leiderkranzwill have their new hall at 275 Richmond street west completed before the new year. Ex-Ald Steiner, the oldest member of the society, laid the corner stone at 3.30 Monday afternoon. On this a beautiful building will be constructed at a cost of $25,000.

A small audience of members of the society watched the proceedings. The choir, under the leadership of Mr. Vogt, gave two selections. Mr. Nordheimer, German Consul, Ald. Saunders, Ex-Consul Heimrod and President Zeidler delivered brief addresses.

The World is not prepared at this moment to discuss the absolute merits of the House of Lords, nor the necessity of a second chamber in parliamentary and constitutional government. As far as the latter is concerned no one denies the need of a second chamber. The instruments of government and of the settlement of great questions are not, as this correspondent would try to make out, men who wear fashionable clothes or who have Picadilly characteristics. But all kinds and descriptions of men have at times been instruments through which revolutions have been prevented, or have been carried, and it, therefore, is neither here nor there whether the instruments which send these questions to the people happensd to be made up of hereditary and enobled cattle raisers or otherwise.

The real issue is whether Ireland is to have Home Rule, and whether the people of Ireland and Great Britain approve of the same. For once at least the House of Lords has justified its existence, and that in the latter end of this Nineteenth Cen.
