A Tale of the American Revolution. CHAPTER VII.

CHAPTER VII.

The snow was no longer falling. The air, motionless and orisp, vibrated only with the crisp tread of their feet and the cawing of a wavering line of crows. The monotone of the twilight deepened over the white desert, across which shone consistent in the control of the control of the control of the disgrates with which the world was clothed, disparting, showed roseste vistas, revealing inner azure deeps, where a silver moonboat floated with one star in its wake.

They walked on briskly and silently, something of the strangeness of the strange, new world, whence all familiar landmarks were blotted out, drawing them together in the gathering shadows. Once short moving waggon, piled with firewood, creaked past, so near that they could see the vapor of the horses' breath. There was closer communion in this silence than either of them knew, and as the solitude and dusk increased, they each became to the other stranger of the stranger in the effaced and isolated
