SALASH,

Nor can it be solved until some one of our many fair maidens comes forward and confesses. A letter was found by a reliable resident of this town which has caused no small sensation in our midst. Unfortunately, the address was obliterated by the rain, and the only means by which the owner can be identified is the description given in this remarkable epistle. The maiden may be suppassingly beautiful. She is spoken of as a "dew-drop," as the the happy possessor of a "rosebub mouth," "innocent, drooping eyes," etc. The writer gives vent to an expressive with the warmth of their devotion. He grows somewhat sacrilegious towards the close when he informs his fair charmer "that if he could kiss her once he would think he was in Heaven."
