ARE YOU CRUEL?

Are you cruel? He wasn't Sorry. "What an outrageous question," you will answer me at once. "I should hope not."

I should hope not, too, and yet I am afraid I am that I am not apart from my kind by this trait, because I have too often noticed the instinct in other people, who were for the most part perfectly good people.

It is strange, but I do really think it is true, that there is a streak of cruelty, of the desire to hurt for the sake of hurting that, common to the surface at moments in the best of us.

Blow Off Steam. We are exasperated by some piece of ill luck; we are made impatient by some irritating delay; we are tired and nervous, and what is our instinctive method of relief? To say something sharp and unkind, preferably to the people we care the most for.

Sometimes we explain ourselves to ourselves by saying that we are criticizing them for their own good or that we didn't realize that we would hurt their feelings. "That's so," we say to ourselves, "but that was the sole purpose for which we lashed out."

At least, a part of us wanted that. I suppose that part is the streak of the cruel that comes down to us from primitive man who kept himself alive against tremendous odds only by the possession of such qualities.

Jokes That Ticked Towns.

BE WIDE AWAKE ON ALL FOOLS' DAY.

Everybody is supposed to have a sense of the ridiculous on April 1st, because it is the day set apart for the great game of "fooling."

The editor of a well-known county paper was once caught napping by a joker, who caused him to publish in his April 1st issue accounts of no fewer than three imaginary weddings. The parties said to have taken part in the ceremonies were living persons, who gave the editor such a warm time that he offered a reward of £100 for information regarding the identity of the hoaxers. But, although they had used the stationery supplied by the paper to its regular correspondents, they were not discovered.

Surtees, author of "The History and Antiquities of the County Palatine of Durham," practised—doubtless in an attempt to live up to his birthday, which was April 1st—a clever imposture on Sir Walter Scott. Concocting a number of "old" ballads, he sent them to the poet, who published them before he even suspected their real character.

In Paris some years ago there was a novel April "catch." A young woman, having pocketed a watch while in the house of a friend, was arrested and taken before the magistrates. She said the whole thing was an imposition d'Avril (literally, an April fish, which corresponds to our April fool), and denied that the watch was in her possession, though when a messenger went to her house he found it on the chimney-piece.

"What have you to say now?" asked the chief magistrate.

"The messenger, too, is an April fool!" she returned, lightly.

Entering into the spirit of the joke, the magistrates ordered her to be detained in the House of Correction until the following April 1st, and to be discharged then as an April fool.

Two historical characters were more fortunate on All Fools' Day. Francis Duke of Lorraine and his wife, while in captivity at Nantes, decided to attempt to escape. On April 1st they disguised themselves as peasants, plodded through the streets, and left the city. Just after they had passed the gates they were recognized by a woman, who ran to the sentry and gave the alarm.

"April fool!" he exclaimed, with a grin.

All the guard, led by the sergeant, did likewise, and then jeeringly advised the woman to try again the following year.

Later in the day it was discovered that the birds had actually flown. The duke and his wife were not recaptured.

Hoaxing Telegrams.

Sometimes fools are made whole-sale on April 1st. Many years ago a large number of people in London received through the post a card bearing an official-looking seal (a big dab of sealing-wax impressed with an inverted sceptre) and an inscription, beginning: "Tower of London. Admit bearer to view the annual ceremony of washing the white lion on Sunday, April 1st." The result was amazing, and for some hours on the appointed day everybody appeared to be going towards Tower Hill.

Teaching M. P.'s to Be Tidy.

BEHIND THE SCENES AT ST. STEPHEN'S.

Life at the House of Commons is anything but dull, according to the stories told by Mr. Arthur Haskell, who has just retired from the position of chief doorkeeper.

"It was one of my duties," Mr. Haskell told the T-B. man, "to turn out those members who had been ordered out of the House by the Speaker. One night I had to carry out one of the Irish members, who was noted for his great weight. He struggled hard, and I was having a bad time when a happy thought struck me."

"I shouldn't struggle if I were you," I said to him, "I might drop you, and you're such a heavy man that you might break your back." The words were scarcely out of my mouth when he became as quiet as a lamb, and gave me no further trouble. He was a great orator, and used to boast that he always started the day with three large chops.

Snuff for Sleepy Members. "I have carried out scores of members in my time, and once I had to deal with a woman who got into the House by some mysterious means and made a disturbance. I picked her up in my arms and passed her on to two constables. Members said it was the quickest thing they had ever seen, but I didn't like the job a bit."

"For many years the chief doorkeeper at the House of Commons has had to carry an official snuff-box. Somebody left some money years ago to provide snuff to keep members awake during all-night sittings. Few avail themselves of the privilege now, but Mr. Winston Churchill is an exception."

"Parliament rises much earlier nowadays. When the Budget of 1900 was going through I did not get home until seven o'clock in the morning for weeks on end. Another terrible time occurred in 1907. One night there were forty-six divisions in the course of a debate. I should think that that is a record."

"On one occasion the late John Redmond had made a brilliant speech. 'Isn't it splendid?' said one enthusiastic member to the man sitting next to him. 'Very good, indeed—if we hadn't heard it all before,' said the other, bitterly."

"I have been at the House for twenty-seven years, and I have worked my way up from messenger at the bar, to chief doorkeeper. When I was superintendent of the members' waiting-room, I never allowed members to be untidy there. If they left their coats and other belongings lying about I used to put them away. Consequently, when members came to look for them they couldn't find them. They soon learnt that it paid to be tidy."

"But I never went so far as the man who looked after the cloak-room. I remember once Lord Winterton came in late."

"You're late," said the attendant, severely. "Where have you been?" There's been a division and you've missed it. You ought to have been here."

"Lord Winterton apologized and promised to be in time in future."

"I always made a point of knowing every member. It took me about a fortnight to recognize a new member, but after that I could tell them all from the front and from the back. Most important of all, I knew their voices."

An extraordinary feature about the House is that almost always there are two members who look like twins!

"Of course, I was sorry to leave the House after all these years, and some of the members told me that the House won't be the same place without my smile! I'm sixty-five, but I don't intend to be idle. I'm going to take up dancing!"

What Sharp Eyes Mean to Mankind.

We never see anything that is about us, and no two of us ever see precisely the same things. Each sees what his previous training and his habit of mind have prepared him to see. When an American scientist was in Patagonia he fell in with a card player who told him that always for the first few rounds of the game he knew some of the cards as they were dealt; he recognized them by a difference so slight that another man could not detect it when it was pointed out to him.

Now the scientist mentioned is an ornithologist, and he says that this same prenatally sharp-eyed man was greatly surprised when he was told that half a dozen kinds of sparrows were feeding and singing about the house. He had never seen any difference to them, he said. In size, color, shape or actions they were all alike, so far as he had ever noticed.

Native Patagonians, like other savage peoples, have very keen eyes for certain things which their modes of life have made it indispensable that they should notice. In other words, they are specialists, and as a matter of course they excel in their own particular line. But it does not follow that they have better eyes than are possessed by men of civilized countries.

Set them to find a reversed "e" in the middle of a printed page and the tears will run down their brown cheeks and they would give up the search with aching eyeballs. But the proofreader can find the reversed letter but in a few minutes, and never strain his eyes in the least.—New York Herald.

Historical Cakes.

The events of to-day make history for the future. Even a cake may become historical, especially if it happens to be made for a kingly function. The particular cake made for the King of Great Britain and Ireland on one occasion was big enough and imposing enough to deserve to be placed among the model cakes simply for its own sake.

It was one of the giants of its order, for it stood 13 feet high and weighed a quarter of a ton. The cost was in proportion to its size. The cake represented an outlay of $1500.

By the side of this specimen of the confectioner's art, the cake which had taken its place in history as the largest of the two great wedding cakes of Queen Victoria, was almost insignificant. It was thought at the time to be a big cake, but it weighed only 300 pounds, though it was 12 feet in circumference. Its ornamentation was a representation Britannia blessing the bride and the bridegroom, the Queen and Prince Albert being somewhat appropriately dressed in the costume of the ancient Romans.

Contrasted with these great cakes there is a record of a pignory cake, which was also a wedding cake. It is classed as the smallest wedding cake of all and was a dainty affair, decorated as a present for a child.

Everything about it was as pretty as it had been destined to be, as if it had been destined to be a royal wedding. In nothing did it fall short, not even in the price, which where in the neighborhood of $1000, an ounce was the charge for the inch high cake.—Kansas City Star.

Fleischmann's fresh yeast increases the action of the intestines

The familiar tin-fall package with the yellow label is the only form in which Fleischmann's Yeast is sold

HUNDREDS of men and women have already found freedom from laxatives by eating Fleischmann's fresh yeast.

Doctors are now agreed that proper elimination of waste matter should be brought about by food. One doctor comes right out and states plainly that the indiscriminate use of cathartics is one of the causes of constipation.

Physicians all over the country are recommending Fleischmann's fresh yeast because it is a fresh food, rich in those elements which keep the intestines healthy.

Try it out for yourself. Begin today by adding 2 or 3 cakes of Fleischmann's Yeast to your everyday diet. Keep it up and see how normally and regularly your intestines act. You can get Fleischmann's Yeast fresh daily from your grocer.
