Guelph Evening Mercury

THURSDAY EVENING, AUGUST 15.

NORAH CUSHALEEN OR THE HAUNTED CASTLE.

At a late hour he heard the peculiar knock upon the oaken door, which was the signal that his master had come to visit him. Andrew hesitated a little about opening it, for he thought it might be the ghost imitating his master's knock in order to gain admittance; but in a moment or two he reflected that a ghost could gain access independently of an open door. He therefore concluded that it would be in reality Mr. Hargrave.

The latter was about to repeat the knock, when the bolts were cautiously drawn, and the door as cautiously opened.

'Anything wrong, Andrew, that you are so slow and careful to night?' asked Hargrave anxiously, while Terry, who stood behind him, asked the same question with his eager face.

'No—nothing,' answered Andrew, with apparent unconcern. 'I—I think I was half asleep.'

'Oh is that all. I am glad that nothing calamitous has taken place here. It would have been a doubly bad business, Terry, if we had come to hear of a misfortune as well as to tell of one.'

'Mighty bad, yer honour,' sighed Terry. 'But it's myself wouldn't have been surprised if we had, for bad luck never comes but there's run for it.'

'I am sorry to say we bring evil tidings to you,' said Hargrave to Andrew, after the latter had fastened the door, and followed them to his chamber, receiving the joyous demonstrations of Dash by the way.

'I'm grieved to hear o' it,' returned Andrew. 'It will be something about that monster, her husband.'

'No it concerns Terry. He has been robbed of all his California savings.'

'That's vexin',' said Andrew in a concerned tone. 'Did the robbers break into yer house?'

'Faix, I wish that had been the way of it,' replied Terry, 'for one would have a chance of savin' it, but the blackguards didn't let the boxes come as far as Dundarra.'

'Boxes?' repeated Andrew, inquiringly.

'Yes, I had three of them filled with gold dust, and—'

'Three?' cried Andrew, seizing Terry by the arm.

'Man alive, don't frighten me,' cried Terry. 'Three, yes three white boxes.'

'White?' cried Andrew again, in breathless excitement.

'Oh, misha, sure and he's gone crazy,' said Terry, looking half bewildered at Hargrave.

'Tell me, were they white wadded boxes,' repeated Andrew, with unabated excitement.

'Troth and they were, if it'll do ye any good to know,' answered Terry.

'Hurrah! hurrah!' shouted Andrew, quitting his hold of Terry's arm, and dancing with great agility round the chamber. 'Man, he cried, 'that's the best news I have heard this long time.'

'It is?' said Terry. 'Then it's me-self takes the liberty to think that ye're mighty aisy pleased with news.'

'And me been frichtenin' myself a day wi' thoughts o' a ghaist,' cried Andrew, bursting into a roar of laughter.

'Oh murder! murder!' exclaimed Terry, who considered that Andrew's senses had quite deserted him.

'Murder!' roared Andrew. 'That's just what I thought. Three coffins for one body, and a funeral at midnight— Oh, I can laugh at it noo, but a feared heart I had at the time.'

'For heaven's sake, Andrew, explain yourself,' said Hargrave, who had witnessed his servant's behaviour with unmitigated surprise.

'Come here, sir; come baith o' ye,' said Andrew, beckoning them towards the loop hole.

'They silently obeyed, and the Scotchman, pointing with his finger, remarked—'

'Dae ye see yor corner, that the mun's licht fa's ae sweetly on? Let us gang and howk yonder, and we'll find something worth while.'

'Pooh, pooh! you are fooling us, said Hargrave, impatiently.

'Am I?' returned Andrew coolly.— 'Then come wi' me, and I'll tak the fire-shovel and howk myself.'

Not knowing what to make of it, they accompanied Andrew to the outside, and he led them into the enclosure, and began to dig with great alacrity in one corner. The earth was very soft, and the shovel easily removed it. Presently the latter struck on wood, and something white appeared in the moonlight; and Andrew bent down, and with great quickness, lifted three boxes, one after the other, and laid them on the ground.

'Thunder and ouns, if these aren't my boxes!' exclaimed Terry.

'There's me doot o' that,' returned Andrew, with great composure.

'And how could they possibly come here?' said Hargrave, who was not less amazed than Terry himself.

Andrew, who was breathing pretty hard after his exertion, sat down on the boxes, and told what had transpired on the previous night, the idea he had formed from the sight he saw, and the fear and perplexities he had experienced all that day.

The recital was met by a wild joyous whoop from Terry, who immediately began to caper round the enclosure, and throw up his heels in the most extravagant manner.
