

POETRY.
IN MEMORIAM.

Calmly she lay, with closed eyes,
Peace hovered o'er her motionless face,
And shed the beams of heavenly grace,
The holy beauty of the skies.

Long, long had Paul's enamoured dart
Wrought woe within her troubled breast,
Till Death, in pity, gave her rest,
And eased the throbbings of her heart.

Cold as the autumn wind, he swept
Into the room; we felt him near,
He chilled our hearts with breathless fear,
He kissed her brow, and then—we wept.

We touched her lips, we sighed a prayer,
We laid her in her cold, cold bed,
With blooming flowers above her head,
That cast their fragrance on the air.

When from this earth her spirit true
Flew to the throne of God at last;
When from our grieving hearts she passed,
How much we loved her then we knew!

We feel she looks upon us still
With beaming eye, from sorrow free;
She kisses, though we cannot see,
And whispers words of love that thrill.

We weep not now, why should we weep?
A blessed knowledge dries our tears—
An angel-whispered thought that cheers—
This is not death but sleep.

With glorious waking up on high,
No more to dread misfortune's breath—
Is this thy victory, O soul that sighs,
And half resigned again we sigh.

The Braes of Yarrow
An Historical Tale of the Sixteenth Century.

The sound of horses' hoofbeats were heard in the distance.

"The traitor has escaped," shouted Captain Lindsay, rushing forward with another body of men-at-arms, the glare of the torches flashing upon their steel breastplates and headpieces. "Hark, there go the horses."

"Then Arran is safe," muttered Spens to himself; and then, "To you, Master Elliot, who should have been my friend, I surrender my sword."

And he allowed the weapon to drop from his hand to the ground as he spoke.

Gilbert was surprised by this sudden encounter with the man whom he had some time thought dead, and of whose life he had heard with so much joy, and was sorely grieved by the circumstances under which they met. He had, however, no alternative but to place him under arrest.

"You may think hard of me for this," he whispered in the ear of the prisoner as they were conducting him to the guardroom; "but be of good cheer, sir, for you shall not die if my life can save yours."

Spens made no reply, and Gilbert moved to the front of his men with a twinge of pain in his heart. This seemed the cruellest thing of all that night's suffering—to have been compelled to arrest the man under whose protection he had been reared, and whom he loved.

Although the knight had not answered the pledge of fidelity that had been tendered to him, he thought that the words of the man were not those of the man who had been represented to him as trying to win his wife from her allegiance. Still that note—written beyond doubt by Margaret's hand—which the false pilgrim had given to him tortured him; because he had thought to ask Mistress Spens for the explanation which might have relieved him at once of doubt, and he had failed to discover any explanation for himself other than that she had learned to regard the youth with feelings deeper than those of a friend.

They marched through the gardens, passing many excited groups of soldiers and masquers who peered at them curiously.—Lindsay, walking first, stonically declined any information to those lords and ladies who made enquiry.

Everywhere signals of alarm were found; but most of all in the hurried passing to and fro of the men-at-arms, and in the appointment of double sentinels at every gate and doorway.

Having placed the prisoner in the guardroom, Captain Lindsay beckoned to Master Elliot to follow him. As soon as they were in the Court the Captain halted abruptly, and by the torchlight, which made every object palpable almost as if by day, he scanned the features of the guard closely.

"How did the gate of the Court and the portal of the Park come to be open?" he demanded sharply.

"Here are the keys you gave to my charge," answered Gilbert frankly, "they have not been used since I received them."

"Why had you quitted the gate—that was your post?"

This question was not so readily answered. He had resolved that no power should force from him the disclosure of the part Mistress Douglas had played in the night's work, and he was for the moment at a loss. Then—

"I found that the sentinels had been wailed from their posts; I raised the cry of treason, and left the gate to follow one whom I suspected, but whom I lost sight of in the darkness."

"I am glad your answers are satisfactory. I trust you with the prisoner."

The Captain turned upon his heel and entered the Palace to seek instructions. Gilbert hastened back to the guard-room, hoping to obtain a few minutes conversation with the friend from whom he had been parted on the fatal field of Flodden, and with whom he had met again under such unhappy circumstances.

In the Queen's ante-room Captain Lindsay found Angus in close conversation with a tall, thin, cunning-eyed man, who instantly became silent on his entrance.

"Sir Walter Spens has been taken, my lord," said the Captain.

"No one else?" queried Angus, apparently disappointed.

"No one else, my lord. What shall we do with him?"

The man with the tall face whispered a word to the Earl, who thereupon spoke fiercely—

"Cast him into the safest and deepest dungeon of the Castle, and let him lie there."
