HELEN MOIR OR LOVE AND HONOUR.

A TALE OF THE CLYDE.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Then they both threw themselves upon him, and a terrific struggle ensued, for the strongest passions in the nature of each were inflamed, and called forth their full strength to the utmost. Bridgenorth was a powerful man, and his rage made him fiercer as a lion, so that he dashed the weak-limbed Frenchman from him with the force of a projectile. But presently the long arms of the Hunchback were twined round him in a suffocating embrace, and the great strength which resided in his misshapen frame was more of a match for Bridgenorth's roused energy. The most strenuous efforts which the latter put forth could not free him from the vice-like hold of Jaquin, and they swayed and rolled from side to side of the narrow cabin with deadly wrestle amid the smoke.

Before the struggle could be determined on either side, Dubosque had recovered, and flew to the assistance of his associate, and at the same moment two men—attracted by the report of the pistol and the noise of the struggle—rushed into the cabin, and all four throwing themselves on Bridgenorth, soon overpowered him, and bound him securely with strong cords.

Meanwhile, Helen had, with a wild scream, flown on deck, and in her distraction was about to throw herself over the side to escape the horrible fate which Dubosque had threatened, when she was caught in the arms of the officer who had lured them on board, and prevented from carrying out her rash purpose.

"For the love of heaven, do not hold me," she cried. "Oh, if you be a man, let me escape from the hands of that monster."

"Could not think of letting you leap over the side, Mam'selle," he returned, keeping close hold of her. "He doesn't mean to harm you—quite the opposite. He means to marry you, and—Jill! she has fainted. How devilish pretty she is. Don't wonder that Dubosque wants to snatch her from the arms of the lubberly pork-eating German. I'd better have her below before she comes round."

He bore his senseless burden down the companion-way, and carried her into the cabin, where by this time her father was securely bound, and rendered incapable of further resistance.

Helen revived as they carried her in, and seeing her father prostrate on the floor, she flew forward with a shriek and knelt beside him.

"On, father, father," she piteously cried, laughing in her terror that he was wounded and dying.

"Don't alarm yourself on his account, Mam'selle," said Dubosque. "We have not hurt him, and it is his own fault that he lies there. I have no intention to do either him or you an injury, and provided he will keep quiet and offer no useless resistance, his cords will be taken off. Rouse up, you and the men can go; we shall not need you further."

The men went away, and the prisoners were once more alone with their two enemies.

"Monsieur is too hot and hasty," observed the Frenchman, whose eye was to consider his victim if he could. "I was provoked into saying what I did not mean. I am too deeply penetrated by love for Mam'selle to offer her an insult. And though I have taken this unusual method to secure the prize, I shall not abuse the power I have gained. For the rest of the voyage you shall not be molested by our presence—only kept in this cabin in safe custody. So soon as we land in France our marriage shall be duly and regularly celebrated, and after that when Monsieur and Mam'selle find that matters are unalterable, they will no doubt submit with a good grace, and become pleasant and agreeable. Here is a small knife, Mam'selle, with which, when we are gone, you can cut the cords by which Monsieur is bound. For the present, farewell. You shall have every comfort compatible with your safe custody."

He laid the knife on one of the cushioned seats, and he and Jaquin quitted the cabin—the latter casting back on them a hideous grin as he closed the door and thrust its bolts into their sockets.

With an eager yet suppressed exclamation, Helen darted to where the knife was lying and snatched it up. Her first act with it was to cut the bonds from her father's limbs, but, with a concentrated thrill of feeling, she placed it carefully away in her bosom, rejoicing in the thought that, should the moment of extremity come, she had the means of escaping for ever from the polluting hands of Victor Dubosque.

It is stated that during the past year greater accessions in proportion to membership have been made to Episcopal than to any other American churches in the city of New York.
