As fast as the herds can be driven in they are coming under the shearers' hands.

In a large, low shed eight of these men are now hard at work from sunset to sunrise clipping the fleeces from the wearers' backs. They all experts, these knights of the shears and bended backs, and can easily account for their 90 or 100 head each per day. The crackerjack member of the gang is stated to be able to take off over 150; anyway, he can almost do it with his eyes shut. The sheep, free from their encumbrance, and looking rather like newly-peeled potatos, are then driven into another pen, where they are marked in a particular way; others are to be killed—these again are distinguished by the "U Bar" mark, although they do not themselves realize the significance of the difference. The wool is sorted in almost as quick time by an expert who halls from Australia, where the wool business has attained to enormous proportions. He can tell by a glance just what grade the wool is, and throws it into crates accordingly.
