THE AIRMAN IN A BARRAGE.

Fascination of Adventures in the Clouds.

The Observer has seen his bombs burst among the buildings of the factory, and he knows that the explosions will be followed almost immediately by a hostile demonstration.
He is still leaning over the front of the machine, watching the clouds of smoke among the roofs which he has destroyed, when he sees rushing upwards from the ground chains of luminous green balls, which pass in front and on either side of him. He does not trouble about these, for with the first bursting of the bombs fifteen great searchlights have leaped from the ground and are sweeping the whole sky near him, making it full of light and illuminating the machine, although they have not touched him. Some of the beams pass within a few feet of him—blinding lanes of white light, seeming almost tangible.

At the same time he sees four quick red flashes in one place near the town, followed by several others in different positions, as battery after battery comes into action to start a barrage over the factory and its vicinity.

He waits... and almost begins to count. Suddenly he sees, a brilliant red flash near the machine, and another and another, and hears the sharp crack crack of the burning shells. On the ground now the flashes are incessant, and the shells burst all around him as he passes through the clouds of green balls, like puffs of smoke float past him, and he can see them dotted all over the sky—white in the moonlight.

He seems to be passing through a cauldron of fire. Searchlights are everywhere; the sky is split with them in a dozen different directions as they cross and recross, forever looking for him. Hundreds of green balls, like sparkling necklaces of emeralds, come soaring by the wings, leaving their trails of smoke. Ceaselessly the red flashes of the shells light up the machine as they burst around it.

The excitement is intoxicating. It seems unreal and exotic yet somehow he is not frightened. He almost wants to shout with the wonder of it all. "To move amid such a sea of light and fire moving and flashing past him, and to have the power of expression of hatred and of the desire to find him out and destroy him, and yet to pass through it unscathed, is a feat." If he had seen all the terrible array of searchlights and the wall of bursting shells before him as he approached his objective he would probably have suffered from a great fear, for anticipation is the best friend of terror. But now that it has started around him, and he has to pass through it in order to get away, the effect is very different—mental and physical excitement overcome all the suggestions of reason, and fear is overwhelmed by a kind of ecstasy.

Meanwhile the machine is getting very near the ground, but he knows that if the engines are started now the results will be disastrous, for the whole of the enemy weapons, searchlights, shells, machine gun fire, green balls, at present scattered, will be concentrated upon him, and his downfall will be almost certain.

At last he looks back over the tail of the machine and sees the massed iron of light sufficiently far enough behind him to be harmless. The pilot puts on the engine and speaks to him. "Well! That was hot! How did you do, old man?"
"All right! Hit the place, anyway! Glad it's all over, aren't you? What about some of your chocolate?"
