"It is worth nothing. What are the Broadmeads to me, or Richard Laucross either?

'I wish you were telling truth, Poppy. But I know he is something to you, something more than I shall ever be; and I have a feeling at my heart which tells me this is the last friendly talk we shall ever hold together. Come, you won't refuse me a kiss, a last kiss, for old friendship's sake?'

The following is Mr. Tennyson's last poem. It is entitled 'De Profundis,' and is published in the Nineteenth Century for May:—

DE PROFUNDIS.

'No—I have kissed you twice. I have the record he — and he laid his hand upon his left side with as tender a look as his ugly, kindly face could gather up—there, Poppy, where the memory will live while my heart heats. The first kiss was a farling low:

And every phase of ever heightening life, Taken in Exchange as part payment for new ones.

With this last moon, this crescent, her dark orb, Touched with earth's light, thou comest, arring life, Taken in Exchange as part payment for new ones.

THE REPAIRING of all there, Poppy, where the memory will live while my heart beats. The first kiss was at our pic-nic at Lty Bridge, when —'

Oh, I don't want to hear when it was !
How can you remember such nonsense?

'Lightly given, lightly forgotten, Luffincot said, bending towards her averted face, on which the moonlight and the shadows, flitted, giving it a momentary look of pale tenderness. Don't be hardhearted, Pop y—I have loved you so long. Give me one last kiss—I'll never ask again—and I'll say good-bye and Heaven bless you. Poppy.'

Touched with earth's light, thou comest, darling boy;
Our own, a babe in lineament and limb;
Perfect, and prophet of the perfect man;
Whose face and form are hers and mine in one, Indissolubly married, like our love. Live and be happy in thyself and serve men
May bless thee, as we bless thee, O, young life.
Breaking with laughter from the dark, and may

In man.

And last, in kindly curves, with gentlest full, By quiet fields, a slowly dying power, To that last deep where any other.

CHAPTER VII.

With a sheepish look upon the simple face, a dismayed and astounded air about his well-drilled form, the boy-ish lover of Poppy stood up as her ish lover of Poppy stood up as her brother came forward to greet them.

'Phobe,' he said, with an intonation in his voice which gave her a little electoric shock, 'why are you here? And without not even a cloak on your shoulders!' he added, glancing at her bared neck. 'Luffincot you should have had more sense than to expose my sister to the night-air in this way; every one knows she is not strong.'

'I'll run and fetch a cloak,' gasped Luffincot preparing gladly to fly.
