To fay the truth, Rochefort, the very place which, from its fituation, feemed the least to invite an attack, was confequently the most neglected by the French in their plan of defence, and therefore bid the faireft for fuccess against it, in case of its being practicable to penetrate with a body of troops, fo far as to get before it; whilft the difperfion of their forces, stationed either in the places judged more obvious to infult, or within reach to fuccour them, should give our's the fairer play for carrying it by furprize. Confidering however its importance, especially in point of its being one of the principal ports of equipment, implying in courfe its containing docks, stores, arfenals, and shipping, the destroying of which would be cutting the very finews of their marine force, which must make it the more a national object for us to attempt; it cannot, reconcileably to common fenfe, be imagined they would intirely leave it out of their general plan of defence. They might not indeed do all that could have been done to put it into a condition of not fearing an infult, if they had feared one; but they undoubtedly made fome difpositions against a contingency, which, if not probable, was not however impoffible; or, no doubt, the great wildom of our government would not have pitched upon it for its object.

Befides,