the evening were: Stewart Lyon of The Globe, John Galbraith and Louis F. Heyd, the candidate.

Mr. Lyon, the first speaker of the evening, dealt largely with a so-called description of the reciprocity agreement. He declared that one of the principal arguments of the Conservatives was that of annexation, but that it really had nothing whatever to do with the question of reciprocity. He pointed out that reciprocity had been the platform of both political parties for a great number of years, and that Sir John Macdonald, at his last political meeting, urged reciprocity between the platform of both political parties for a great number of years, and that Sir John Macdonald, at his last political meeting, urged reciprocity between the United States and Canada.

Mr. Heyd got a good reception. He was full of his arguments, and showed that he was an orator of the passionate order, delivering his speech in a forceful manner. He dealt at great length with the pork-packing industry in Toronto and other Ontario towns, which is controlled, he stated by Mr. Flavelle and his associates. He brought out the fact that bacon was selling in Britain much cheaper than it was being sold right here in Canada, and showed to his own satisfaction how by the arrangement of the American and Canadian tariffs on hogs, the hogs coming into Canada from the States were taxed, and bacon vice versa. The result was that the packers were able to control the price of bacon in our country. In the mind of Mr. Heyd it would not make much difference to the carpenters or laborers of Canada whether a man named Laurier or Borden, was premier of the Dominion, so long as they had cheaper food.

He declared that reciprocity would mean free trade with the United States in natural products, and complete abolition of all duties on manufactured goods, and that it should never have been made a political issue, as it was purely an affair of business, a matter of trade. In closing, Mr. Heyd appealed to the electors to vote for reciprocity, and said that if he were elected he would do all in his power to further the interests of the South York riding. John Gallsfaith also addressed the meeting, which closed with cheers for the King, Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mr. Heyd. G. Lawrence, president South York Liberal Association, was in the
