THE GARLAND.

THE LAST DAY.

(From Pollock's "Course of Time.")

No sign of change appeared: to every man
Thet day seemed as the past. From noontide path
The san looked cloriously on earth, and all
Her scenes of giddy folly smiled seem.
When suddenly, aias, fair Earth! the sun
Was wrapped in darkers, and his beams returned
Up to the throne of God, and over all
The earth came night, moonless and starless night.
Nature stood still. The seas and rivers stood,
And all the winds, and every living thing.
The cartaract, that, like a giant wroth,
Rushed down impetuously, as seized, at once,
By sudden frost, with all his heavy locks,
Stood still; and beasts of every kind stood still.
A deep and dreadful silence reigned alone;
Hope died in every breast, and on all nen
Came fear and trembling. None to his neighbour spoke.
Hustand thought not of wife, nor for for feels,
Is horrible suspense all mortles stood;
And, as they stood and listened, clariots were heard,
Rolling in heaven. Revealed in faming fire,
He augel of God appeared in stature vast.
Blazing, and, fifting up his hand on high.
By Him that lives for ever, swore that Time
Should be no more. Throughout, creation heard
And sighed; all rivers, lakes, and sens, and woods,
Desponding waste, and cultivated vale,
Wild cave, and ancient hill, and every rock,
Sighed. Earth, arrested in her wonted path,
An ox struck by the lifted axe, when naught
Vas feared, in all her entrails deeply groaned.
A universal cresh was heard, as if
The ribs of Nature broke, and all ther dark
Coundations failed; and deadly paleness sat
Devery face of man, and every heart
Grow chill, and every knee his fellow smote.
Hone spoke, none stirred, none wept; for horrir held
All motionless, and fettered every tongue, again, o'er all the nations silence fell;
And, in the heaven, robed in excessive light,
Chat drove the thick of darkness far aside,
And when the common of the creating Word,
And when the common of the creating word,
and slience, from eternity that slept
Beyond the sphere of the creating Wo

Decision of Character.—Were I entrusted with the education of youth, I would early impress on them the importunce of this quality. I would teach them by practical lessons, its ages and advantages. I would plan out emergencies in which I would call upon them to act promptly and decisively—and this I would plan out emergencies in which I would call upon them to act promptly and decisively—and this I would repeat again and again though the should decide an act wrong in every instance, till I had fault tught them to act with promptness and decision.—Once acquired, the habit never would Jorsake them; and the judgement, when matured by your and corrected by experience, would lead them to think rightly. I rousider, indeed, a vacillating, temporising disposition of mind the cause of a large pepportion of the evil in life and of the ill success in business. Lock at the young man, just from the parent roof, and placed in a large city, surrounded by cospanions whose intercourse and example he knows must be contaminating. If he is one of a decided character, he will readily form the determination to slum fheir society, and he accaptes their influence. If, unfastwately, he has not acquired the habit of deciding for himself—if he is awed by the fear of being thought different from his follows, but is resolved not to commit himself in all their excess—what does he do—show does he act—and what is his fate? Its mingles awhile in their more innecent pleasures—he sipe the draft which they drain to the draps—he cauters only a little into the dissipations into which they plungt—he dreads to be thought singular, and he goes half way with them; but he all the while resolves to ratmee his steps, when he can do so with honor. The time at last come when he must recede or advance—the decisive moment is at hand—now his fate must be determined—he acture beckons him on, duty bids him go back—he is acts in his opinion—he doubt—he is still undecided—he is lo
