ture, upon writers and the new literary currents, and Ttolstoy grew more animated.

"What are they driving at, what are they contriving? They are exhausting themselves in vain efforts. There are no such people as they portray, there is no such life. Even the language is overdrawn. There are no such words nor expressions in the Russian speech. The only exception is the Officer Kuprin. You will excuse me for dubbing him 'Officer Ruprin'—that is what I always call him. He does not strain himself and does not invent, but just as Chekov used to do he will take a bit of life—say, for instance, as we are now sitting at table —and will describe it so that the people will be vividly portrayed, their souls will be seen, and life will be represented."

Tolstoy's daily life is simple. In the morning the samovar is placed upon the table and the members of the family, as well as the guests of the house, help themselves to tea or coffee, whichever one may prefer. Tolstoy has his tea served in his room, and

FEELINGS OF ONE NEAR DEATH. In the Bourse Gazette recently an peared a letter from Tolstoy never be fore published. In that letter the fafeelings of one who is summing up

"To say that the feeling of one approaching the entrance of a new life is only a feeling of joy, arising from an expectation of a speedy cessation of all earthly wearings, is the same as if to matograph entertainments in promotion of its propaganda for an increase in the German navy, and naval exhibitions were held in seventy-eight towns of over 5,000 inhabitants and were largely visited.

Three hundred teachers were taken on a sea trip, and seven scholars' excursions to seaports, in which over 2,000 children took part, were also successfully carried out, as well as numerous trips for adult members.

Than 700 lectures and numerous cinematograph entertainments in promotion of its propaganda for an increase in the only feeling experienced by the returning prodigal was one of joy because of his having reached the end of his weary journey. If there be in it a particle of that feeling it is so infinitesimal and in itself so insignificant that it not only cannot obscure but should not even be mixed up with the feeling which carries in itself the character of eternity, and which is one of heartfelt thankfulness in the conformance of one's sciousness of the importance of one's sciousness of the importance of one's whole life that one feels before his approaching death. Besides, every one has experienced a feeling of wearlness and even a craving for death, and I for my part felt it many a time, not after I was freed from temporary, passing passions and cravings, but, on the contrary, while I was still enslaved by them and could not satisfy them. But that is not all; when one suffers from toothache or with a pain in his stomach, or with rheumatism, he often thinks how good it would be to fall asleep forever more. But when you are on the threshold of death life is so full of light and radiance that the foolish wish to go away from that which is eternal and unperishable cannot even enter one's mind. No matter if one has trouble or not, horrible is the life of a man who imagines that the only light is that which comes through his window, and the only life is that particle which we live in."

world, is a source of great suffering to him, as the mere preparations for the celebration had already called out many manifestations of hatred and spitefulness. He has received a great many letters from orthodox Russians in which he was atold what an insult his celebration would be to them. Most of all he was astounded by a letter from Princess "E. D. K.," in which the feeling of bitter animosity and indignation was especially glarins.

All that remained for the committee was to obey the will of Tolstoy and dissolve, but not wishing to give up wholly what they had already so far accomplished they decided to organize into a league under the name of Tolstoy, and continue the work of the propagation of his name and his works
