She could talk of bygone heroes. She could tell offhand their names. She could tell when Rome was founded. And the date it fell in flames.

She could tell of styles and fashions. At a mile-a-minute rate; But she had to ask her husband. If her hat was pinned on straight.

AN ELEPHANT ON THE RAIL

Last year, on a hot day in September, Gaskell's Street Fair, a show which owns two big elephants, was being carried from Parkersburg to Cincinnati on the Baltimore & Ohio Southern Railroad.

The elephants were in the car behind the engine, and a port in the end of the car had been opened in order that they might get plenty of air. Soon one of the elephants thrust his trunk out of the window and began to search over the top of the tender, and quickly found and removed the cover of the hole through which the tender is filled with water.

Here was amusement for a travelling elephant! He took trunkfuls of water inside the car and spouted it over himself and his companion in delightful play. He then, and quickly found and removed the cover of the hole through which the tender is filled with water.

About fifteen miles from Parkersburg, Johnson, the engineer, happening to glance at his water-gauge, started in dismay. He called the fireman, and together they wandered over the mystery. The tank had been filled full at Parkersburg, but the gauge showed hardly enough water to carry them to the next station. They decided that the tank must have sprung a leak.

"Well, I do hope the water will last till we get to the next stop," said the engineer. At this time the level of the water in the tender had fallen below the elephant's reach, and the train did succeed in getting to the station. Then, to the astonishment of the conductor, the locomotive backed up to water.

"What's the matter, Bill?" he asked, running up to the engineer. "We haven't got time to water here. What's the matter, anyway? You took water back at Parkersburg?"

"I can't help it, whether we've got time or not," answered Bill angrily. "I can't go any further without water, unless you want me to blow up the engine. Yes, we did water at Parkersburg, but the tank's sprung a leak."

"Mighty funny!" said the conductor. "It ain't leakin' now."

Sure enough, not a sign of a leak was to be found.

The tank was filled to overflowing, and the train pushed forward, and the engineer glanced at the water-gauge, he was astonished and perplexed, for the gauge showed that the water was nearly half gone.

Fireman and engineer looked at each other in dumb amazement. Then the fireman climbed up on the high-laden tender to investigate. Reaching the top of the coal, he was met by what he took to be an enormous serpent, and scrambled back into the cab. "Bill," he gasped, white with consternation, "there's a snake on the tank as thick as my arm."

"Stuff!" said Johnson. The engineer
