Job Printing Executed.

The Prodigal.

There's a magic in the mountains and a spell about the sea That makes you feel the spirit and know infinity. But for me there is no sweetness in the summit of the sand. For my eyes are toward the sunset and my own home land.

I feel fearful in the forests, were the pine-cones strewn the sod. In the shadows and the silence I seem too near to God. Each step seems profanation of His presence and I'm cold. Lest the awful eyes are watching and judging me as bold.

There's a glamor o'er the city when the lights are popping out. But out's lonesome with no smile for you, and all the smiles about; I'm thinking of a country where you pass the time of day With each passer, friend or stranger, who happens down your way.

It's not pretty like the mountains nor as splendid as the sea, And you'll have to ride some miles before you ever find a tree; Water holes are not so frequent and the summers can't be praised. But I love the short-grass country where I was born and raised.

I love its early mornings and the cobwebs on the grass. And the yellow-vested field larks bobbing bowdy as you pass. Every cactus bush a blossom with a wealth of red and gold. And all the world so fresh and fair you clean forget it's cold.

The city's lights are pretty, but I'm thinking of the stars; I can't get peace of mind in all this thunder of the cars. The yelping of the coyotes would sound sweeter than the band. For my eyes are toward the sunset and my own home land.

Japanese Police In Riots.

Hold People in Awe by Means of Iron Rods.

The police of Tokio have been going through a hot time during the recent riots, brought about by a Parliamentary crisis. Several lost their lives in battle with the mob, which fired the stations and razed them to the ground.

Ordinarily, the guardian of the peace in the land of earthquakes has rather a good time. He is dressed in black from head to foot, and sometimes armed with a staff like a short billiard-cue though usually he carries a more formidable weapon, which he handles with considerable dexterity. It is an iron rod about 2 feet long and at the end of the rod is a ring and a heavy lash. This knotted lash is calculated to restore order and command respect for the law and its representative, and it is amusing to observe how rapidly an unruly crowd will melt away on the approach of the Japanese policeman, with his lash ready for action.

The man with the rod has it almost all his own way, and offenders whom he decides to arrest generally follow him like lambs. The least indignity offered to a policeman, the slightest opposition to his demands, is summarily and severely punished; in fact, it is less risky to kill a citizen than offend one of these men.

He has one weakness; he is too prone to yield to argument when backed by a sufficient quantity of the current coin of the realm. If a burglar, when caught, will only consent to go "shares," he may rely upon escaping before the police station is reached. Traders find it advisable to remember this weakness; if they forget it, it is not at all unlikely that Robert will find a burglar on his own account, and the merchant's memory is refreshed by the unpleasant discovery that he has lost three or four times the amount of the tip required by the policeman.

Items of Interest.

The Assouan Dam, in Egypt, with its associated irrigation works, has cost the large sum of $53,000,000; but it is estimated that, as a result of the expenditure, the value of adjacent land has increased more than $1,000,000,000.

Dickens and Balzac, living before novelists walked in fear of libel actions, took the names of their characters from above the shop doors of London and Paris. Mr. Frankfort Moore confessed to an equally easy, but safer method. He draws the names of his folk from tombstones. Dead men read no tales.

Young Man: "My cousin has very long hair. When she undoes it it falls down to her waist."
His Sweetheart: "Indeed!"
Her Kid Brother: "That's nothing. When you undo your hair it falls to the floor, don't it, Mary?"

Indirectly Pasteur solved the famous medieval problem. "How many angels can stand on the point of a needle?" Sir W. Crookes said that, altering the word "angels" to "devils," he had found that, of one of the deadliest diseases that had ever scourged mankind, 500 of the malevolent microbes—veritable devils—could, without overcrowding, find place on the point of the finest needle. —Lecture by Sir William Crookes.

Mrs. Knicker: "Haven't you forgotten I gave you a piece of pie only yesterday?"
Wary Willie: "Yes'm, I've tried to forget and forgive."

An Automobiologue.

(Colliers.)
The auto stood beside the road—all mounted it stood. With wheels a-lump and sorrow in the drooping of its hood. "O woe is me!" it gasped and wept, and "Woe is me!" once more. "Injustices of many sorts have cut me to the core."

"They take me out to have a ride—and suddenly alas! They find that through an oversight I haven't any gas. Who gets the blame? Do they themselves? That's how the case should be. But on the other hand, they hoot and howl and curse at me."

"Ahead of me I see a place where glass is on the path. A puncture comes, and instantly there is a time of wrath. Instead of censuring the one whose duty 'twas to see, They curse the tire man, curse the tire, and double-lash-blank me! 'Transients will occur, unless ere they commence My owner exercises care and likewise common sense.' The clutch gives out, and all that he can see Is just another chance to put the guiltiness on me!"

"My carburetor gets choked up, a cylinder will miss—My owner 'ears his hair and yells. 'What do you think of this?' He yanks me with a monkey wrench, and howls aloud that he Has never seen a bunch of junk that ever equalled me!"

"He lets me skid; he will not feed me properly with oil; He overlooks the water and I then begin to boil—And does he then condemn himself? Not much! In rancous key He uses all the cuss words in some brief remarks at me."

"I wish I were a horse or mule, for then I'd get some care. But autos have to stand for all the evils they can bear. The auto wept again and said: 'Here I come, my owner, he is stuck because of his own fault. The blame will come to me.'"

Minard's Liniment/Co. Limited.
I was very sick with Quinsy, and thought I would strangle. I used MINARD'S LINIMENT and it cured me at once.
I am never without it now.
