A Foolish Expectation.

By RUTH CAMERON.

RUTH CAMERON

The little woman in front of me on the car almost wept for self pity as she told her woes to the older woman.

"I haven't been feeling at all well for the last week," she said. "I didn't tell Tom because I hate to seem to be always a crying baby. But when he came home and spoke about going away for a week's hunting I couldn't help crying. Then he got mad and said I never wanted him to have a good time."

She paused to swallow a little sob. Then she added, almost vindictively, "I bet he'd be sorry if he knew how sick I've felt."

"You didn't tell him?" asked the other woman.

"No. I wouldn't tell him for anything now."

In the meantime, poor Tom!

Of course she will, sooner or later. And in the meantime poor, bewildered Tom will drag himself home evenings to a house over which the shadow of a misunderstanding hangs heavy, wondering just what has hit him.

The craving for sympathy is universal. The baby cries for it, the child demands it, we grown-ups hope for it and feel hurt when we don't get it. It is an easily understood, though rather foolish trait, this forcing our griefs and injuries upon the attention of others, poifit enough to feign an interested sympathy they do not feel. For "no man limps because another is hurt."

But even more foolish than this demand of ours that others sympathize with our sorrows and ills when we tell of them, is the hope of receiving sympathy when the cause for such is withheld.

He Deserves Sympathy, Too.

Tom simply didn't know that his wife hadn't been feeling well. His side is just as understandable as hers, and if either of them deserves sympathy I rather think it is he.

Now and then we make a praiseworthy effort to martyrize ourselves by refusing to demand the sympathy we crave. Our purpose is a worthy one, but to be really worthy of praise it must be adhered to the bitter end.

If She Gives Him a Boiled Dinner.

It Smith, suffering from indigestion, withholds that fact from Mrs. Smith in order that she may not worry, he is doing a Spartan and commendable thing. But if Mrs. Smith, in her ignorance, sets a boiled dinner garnished with mince pie before him, who can blame her for lack of sympathy?

For Smith to eat the dinner, thinking with bitterness how sorry Mrs. Smith would be if she knew how much he suffered and was about to suffer, availeth no one anything. If he chooses he can eat and be miserable, but to be true to the course he has mapped out for himself he must do so without bitterness or self pity.

Engineer Commander Howley

Tells of His Thrilling Experiences in the Dardanelles—Meeting at Halifax Academy.

"If you are not with us, you are against us." These caustic words by Sergeant Knight were the keynote of the recruiting meeting at the Academy of Music last Saturday, a meeting that was one of the most wonderful ever held in this city, a recruiting meeting that thrilled every man, woman and child that crowded the big play house to the roof. How like a sea was the surge of that throng as it swept through the doors, eddied this way and that, and in a trice had filled every nook and cranny of the building. But how like a plaything was that tidal wave of a crowd in the hands of the speakers.

First, was the story of Engineer Lieut. Commander Howley's marvelous escape, told in a humorous and ingenious way that sent delightful chivers running up and down one's spine. His was the tale of the miracle wrought when a man wounded almost unto death fell into the sea, could not swim a stroke, but yet was rescued and nursed back to health once more. It was a "tale to keep children from play and old men from the chimney corner."

In opening the meeting Chairman Justice Wallace read the proclamation of King George, given out but a few days ago, in which His Majesty stated the end was not yet in sight and more and more men are needed. In introducing Engineer Lieut. Commander Howley, Justice Wallace said he was introducing a British sailor who had fought nobly and well. He said Commander Howley was a native of the sister country of Newfoundland as well as a member of the British Navy. He was there to tell of his experience at the Dardanelles.

In rising, Lieut. Commander Howley said he would give a few incidents of the fight in the Dardanelles. He said one day in March last, the fleet formed in a semi-circle and bombarded the Turkish position. Then four British and four French ships closed in and kept up a terrific fire. The British landed twenty men to blow up some of the Turkish forts. Two thousand Turks attempted to snipe the sailors from the village of Seddul Bahr. The irresistible opened fire on the Turks and "in a few minutes," said the speaker, "that village looked like the Halifax South End terminals."

On another occasion he saw five whiffling, full of Turks, shot away by a British cruiser in just five shots. One by one they went, a shot to a windmill. He then told of how his own ship was blown up by a mine. There was a terrific explosion and the ship heeled far over on her side. He was thrown up against the side of the ship. The ship filled rapidly with water and hot vapor. He got up on the shell deck, knowing the possibility of an explosion internally he visited the boiler room. Every man was at his post. He ordered them on deck and they left the boiler room singing "It's a long way to Tipperary." He, too, went on deck and suddenly he felt as if he had received a terrific blow on the head. His feet were taken from under him and he just felt as if the flesh had been ripped off his back. He rolled off the side of the ship into the water. He said he threw out his arms and luck was with him, he caught a log. A picket boat rushed up and saved him.

Commander Howley then exhibited the trousers he had worn when he was wounded. They were a weird sight. Both legs were in tatters, torn to shreds by pieces of shell. Another interesting exhibit was a number of bullets which had been removed from the speaker's body.

"I only got a few of them," said the speaker, "the doctors kept the others."

The speaker then told of some amusing things he had heard of the English Tommy on the western front. He said one day a sign bearing the following words was seen above one of the German trenches:

"We are Saxons. You are Anglo-Saxons. Keep your bullets for the Prussian bullies, they will relieve us at 11 o'clock."

He said the only French word the average Tommy knew was "Allez." One was known to go into a French shop and say to the proprietor: "Allez! give me some milk." The proprietor did not make a move. "Allez, don't you know your own language?" shouted the soldier in exasperation.

They Said Child Could Not Live.

Mother tells how Zam-Buk worked almost a Miracle.

"I wish to let you know of a wonderful instance of the healing power of Zam-Buk," writes Mrs. A. Bruhm, of West Northfield, N.S. "While my little daughter was playing around a bonfire, her clothes caught fire, and she was so badly burned that those who saw her said she could not live. We knew how fine Zam-Buk is, and at once secured a big supply and swathed the child in bandages covered with Zam-Buk. The soothing effect of the balm was soon apparent, and the awful pain was greatly reduced. This treatment was continued, and in a few days the child was on the way to recovery. Naturally, we kept on using Zam-Buk until the pain was finally banished. Healing went on rapidly, and at last my child was quite restored to health."

"After this experience you may rest assured that our home will never be without Zam-Buk, and I would most heartily recommend other mothers to keep it handy at all times."

Is there no child, no adult, in your circle who would benefit from Zam-Buk? Remember the balm is a sure cure for eczema, ulcers, abscesses, ringworm, babies' rashes, inflamed sores, old wounds, etc., as well as for cuts, burns and scalds. Zam-Buk may be had from all druggists and stores for only 50c. box, or direct from Zam-Buk Co., Toronto, upon receipt of price. Zam-Buk is so good that it has been imitated, and more or less harmful imitations are on the market; so be sure to see the name "Zam-Buk" (protected by law) on the box before parting with your money.

Dust should never be swept from one room to another. Take it up in a dustpan, and if you have previously thrown a few tea leaves down this will prevent dust from flying about.
