TANGLED ~

Ellen Adair, only not married to her through a mere chance, she waiting for him now—each hour as it passed—to return and complete the ceremony; and loving her as he should never love any other in this world. And—in the midst of these obligations—to have made the sudden and astounding discovery that Ellen Adair was the only living woman who must be barred to him; whom, of all others, of all the numbers that walked the earth, he must alone not make his wife. The position would have been bewildering to a man without honor; to Arthur Bohun, with his fastidiously high standard, it was simply terrible.

For the few hours that James Bohun lasted, Arthur did nothing. It may almost be said that he thought nothing, for his mind was in a chaos. On the day following his arrival James died; and he, Arthur, had then become heir presumptive. To many, it might have seemed that he was quite as secure of the succession as though he were heir-apparent, for Sir Nash was old and ailing. A twelvemonth ago Sir Nash Bohun had been full of life; upright, energetic, to all appearances strong, hearty, and likely to changed rapidly; and the once healthy man seemed to have little health in him now.

Medical men told him that if he would go abroad and for some months take certain medicinal springs, he might—and in all probability would — regain health and strength, Sir Nash would have tried it but for the decining health of his son.

James could not leave home; Sir Nash would not be separated from him.

What though Arthur Bohun was the heir?

In his present misery, it seemed worse than a mockery to him. A Bohun could not live dishonored; and he must be dishonored to the end of his days. To abandon Ellen Adair would bring the red stain of undying shame to his cheek; to marry her would be, of the two, only the greater disgrace. What, then, could anticipated rank and wealth be to him?-better that he should depart for some far-off land and become an

Any position more cruelly difficult than that of Captain Bohun cannot well be conceived. Madam's communication was not confined to the one first revelation; she added another to it. At first there had been no opportunity for more; the train stopped at a branch station just beyond Eastsea, and the carriage became filled with passengers. Arthur, in his torment, would have further questioned his mother, praying for elucidation; but madam demanded in a whisper whether he was mad, and then turned her back upon him. The people went all the way to London, but as soon as Arthur had handed his mother into a cab, on their way to Sir Nash Bohun's, he began again. The storm that raged at Eastsea had apparently extended its fury to London; the rain beat, the wind blew, the streets were as deserted as London streets at a busy hour of the afternoon can be. Arthur shuddered a little as he glanced out; the elements just now seemed as dark and warring at his fate. "Mother, things cannot rest here," he Frain; you must answer them now. Cannot you see how dreadful this suspense must be to me? I am engaged to marry Ellen Adair; If not today, some day. And now you tell me that, which-which-Which ought to break it off, he was about to say; but emotion stopped him. He raised his hand and wiped the moisture from his forehead. Madam bent down, and kissed his hand. He did not remember to have been kissed by her since he was a child. Her voice assumed a soft, tender tone; comething like tears stood in her eyes. "I can see how you suffer, Arthur; 1 am sure you must love her, poor young lady; and I would give anything not to have to inflict pain or disappointment on you. But what else can I do? You are my son; your interests are dear to me; and I must speak. Don't you remember how I have always warned you against Miss Adair? But I never suspected there would be cause for it to great as this." He did remember it. This new soft mood of madam's became her well. In the midst of his own trouble Arthur spared a moment to think that perhaps he had in a degree misjudged her.

"I cannot understand how so frightful a charge can be brought against Mr. Adair, spoke Arthur. "What you tell me sounds like a fable. I had been given to understand that he and my father were close friends."

"As they were, once." "And yet you say that he, Mr. Adair, was "A convict," spoke madam, supplying the words. "I cannot give you details, Arthur; only facts. He was tried, out there and convicted. He obtained a ticket of leave which I dare say may not have expired yet."

"And his crime?—What was it?" "I told you. Forgery."
"Did you ever know him?"

"Of course I did; at the time when he was intimate with your father. We never quite knew who he was, Arthur; or who his people were at home, or what had taken him originally to India; but Major Bohun was unsuspicious as the day, as you yourself. There arose great trouble, Arthur; gambling and wickedness, and I can't tell you what; and through it all, nearly up to the last, your father believed in Adair."

'Was he a convict then?" "No, no; all that came afterwards; not e, perhaps, but discovery, trial, and conviction. Arthur-how sorry I am to say it, I can never tell you-your father's son had better go and marry that miserable drab, than a daughter of William Adair."

She pointed to a poor wretch that was passing A gaunt skeleton of a woman, with paint on her hollow cheeks, and a tawdry gown trailing in the mud. Arthur pressed his hands to his temples; all sorts of confused thoughts were fighting together within his breast. "Did Mrs. Cumberland know of this?" he asked. 'I cannot say. Her husband did. At the time it all happened, Mrs. Cumberland was away in ill-health. I should think she would hear it from her husband after-

"Then-how could she encourage me to enter into this contract with Mrs. Adair?" returned Arthur, in a flash of resentment.

"You must never see her again, Arthur; you must never see her again. Go abroad for a time if need be; it may be the better "What am I to say to them?" he cried in self-commune. "After all, Ellen is not responsible for her father's sins."

A spasm caught madam. Was this information not sufficient?-would he carry out the marriage yet?
"Arthur, there's worse behind," she breathed. "Why can't you be satisfied?—

"What rest?" he asked, his lips turning Madam's face was white now; white with emotion. Arthur, in his emotion, seized her hard, and gazed at her.

"It is true," she whispered. "He shot himself in the trouble and disgrace that Adair brought upon him. And you, his son, would have married the man's daugh-

With a horrible fear of what he had all but done-with a remorse that nearly turned him mad-with a sort of unformed row never again to see Mrs. Cumberland or Ellen Adair, Arthur Bohun dropped his mother's hand with a suppressed groan, and kent silence until they stopped before the house of Sir Nash Bohun.

Mechanically he looked up at the windows, and saw that the shutters were open, So James was not dead. Arthur gave his hand to madam, to help her in. But James Bohun was as ill as he could be; very palpably nearer death than when madam had started from the house at break of dawn. In fact there had then been some hope, for he had rallied in the night. Arthur never knew that. He supposed his mother had really come off to fetch him, in order that he should be present at the close; he suspected not that she had frantically hastened down to disturb him
