Music.

It is astonishing how quickly an instrumentalist or composer jumps into fame sometimes. The world never heard of Mascagni until his "Cavaleria Rusticana" was produced and suddenly his name was on everybody's lips and he was famous. Five or six years ago Paderewski's name was unknown: a few months afterwards he was regarded as one of the greatest of the world's pianists. Some time the early part of last winter the musical people of Berlin were astounded at the marvellous violin playing of a young man, who came upon them without any flourish of trumpets. A pale, modest, delicate young man he was, having no knowledge that he was especially gifted or, indeed, out of the ordinary. The power and brilliancy of his play was such, however, that the audience was dazzled, almost startled. People spoke of Paganini, of witchery, of the superhuman, and expressed the opinion that in works containing feeling, intellectuality and repose, the sensational player would fail. Accordingly a second and a third concert was arranged, the nature of the programmes being such that the most important works in the literature of the violin were performed, and that in a manner almost beyond criticism. His tone was described as glowing with warmth and vitalized passion, his technique so extraordinary that the most complex and tortuous difficulties were overcome with apparent ease, and his expression so beautifully refined and symmetrical, as to appeal with irresistible force to the most exacting musical mind. His name was Willy Burmester. No one had heard of him before, and now, almost with a bound, as a brilliant meteor flashes across a darkened sky, he became famous. His subsequent appearances have been just as electrifying, for at this moment all London are wagging their heads to the rhythm of his intoxicating play.

In the June number of Music the editor, and excellent writer, Mr. W. S. B. Mathews, writes at considerable length, and very interestingly too, of Louis Moreau Gottschalk, the one time famous American composer and pianist.
