Chapter XXII

"There should be great death, my dear Julius," said the American air hostess lump that hung suspended from the ceiling of a room of the inn, store and postoffice at Lamer.
"Wherever, this being but Wednesday, we have our work to do."
"Which is not so simple, after all, as one studies the situation. Mr. Arncliffe is here, and within reach. We must expect him of being a person of distinction.
He evinces unusual interest in a certain document that was once in your hands."
"Our own hands, if you would be accurate."
"You are cautious, but granted so, we must get them back. The gentleman is dwelling in a bungalow on the mountain side for greater convenience in watching events and waiting the arrival of his wife's sister. We employed a clumsy dwarf to put him out of the road, but he did not, and now we have got to get rid of him. But if he hasn't the papers on his clothes then you have this pleasant scheme for him. He is getting his dinner, and your steamer at Baltimore and cruise-ling with him until he is ready to come to us. The American air hostess has much for your imagination, my dear Julius, or possibly the attitude of the hills has overstimulated it."
"But the admirable, young lady, the fair Miss. Clabber—what becomes of her in these transactions?"
"That is none of your affair," replied Chauvenet, frowning. "I am quite content with my progress. I have not finished that matter."
"Neither I would mean, Mr. Arncliffe.
But I am quite well satisfied to leave it to you. In a few days we shall know much more than we do now. I should be happier if you were in charge in Vienna. A false step there—ugh! I hesitate to think of the wreckage and wreckage."
"I am not to forget that the accident should now sleep the long sleep and that many names have already been said for the repose of his intrepid soul."
"The splendor of our undertaking is enough to draw his ghost from the grave. Ugh! By this time Zonal should have fled our cabaret at the Spring and get your mail at the hotel.
I hope you are not misplaced your confidence in the operator. These coming back our ghost must pass Arncliffe's house."

Wanted.

A Porter and a Bell Boy,
At King Edward Hotel.

"Trust him to pass it. His encounter with Arncliffe have not been to his credit." But they had gone into the Virginia Hills amicably and were quartered with the postmaster. They waited now for Zonal, whom Arncliffe had sent to the Springs with a message and to get Chauvenet's mail. Arncliffe had learned, used the Lamer telegraph office, and they had decided to carry their business elsewhere. While they waited in the bare upper room of the inn for Zonal the big Serbian trumped up the mountain side with an aching head and a heart heavy with drink. The home he had left to in a thick fog he plunged down through the Clabber place and he must now tread back foot to report to his masters. He had made a mess of his errands and nearly lost his life. The bullet from Oscar's revolver had cut a neat furrow in his scalp, which was growing sore and stiff as it ceased bleeding. He would undoubtedly be dealt with harshly by Chauvenet and Durand, but he knew that the sooner he reported his calamity the better he would be situated. Lamer, passing at times to clasp his small head in his great hands. When he passed the wild tangle that hid Arncliffe's bungalow he paused and

"Lost! Lost! They are lost!" cursed the two occupants in his own dialect with a fierce, vile tongue. It was near midnight when he reached the tavern and climbed the rickety stairway to the room where the two men waited. Chauvenet opened the door at his approach, and they cried aloud as the great figure appeared before them and the lamp light fell upon his dark, blood-moored face. "The letters!" snapped Chauvenet. "The message safe?" demanded Durand. "Lost! Lost! They are lost! I lost my way, and he nearly killed me—the little soldier—as I crossed a strange field." When they had jerked the truth from Zonal, Chauvenet flung open the door and hurried through the house for the innkeeper. "Horse! Saddle our two horses quick, and get another if you have to steal it!" he screamed. Then he turned into the room to curse Zonal, while Durand with a towel and water sought to ease the ache in the big fellow's head and cleanse his face. "So that beggarly little servant did it, did he? He stole that paper I gave you, did he? What do you imagine I brought you to this country for if you are to let two stupid fellows with you as though you were a clown?"

The Serbian, on his knees before Durand, suffered the torrent of abuse freely. He was a second-hand, hired to do murder, and his vilification by an engaged employer did not greatly trouble him, particularly since he understood little of Chauvenet's rapid German. In half an hour Chauvenet was again in a fury, learning at Lamer that the operator had gone down the road twenty miles to a dance and would not be back until morning. The imperturbable Durand shivered in the night air and prodded Chauvenet with his foot. "We have no time to lose. That message must go tonight. You may be sure Mr. Arncliffe will not send it for us. Come, we've got to go down to Storm Springs."

They rode away in the starlight, leaving behind postmaster's chambers and a sleeping Durand. Chauvenet and Durand were well mounted on horses that Chauvenet had sent into the hills in advance of his own coming. Real rode grim and silent on a clumsy plow horse, which was the best the publican could find for the job. The horse was not the only weapon he had known in Serbia. He carried a potato sack across his saddle bow. Chauvenet and Durand sent him ahead to set the pace with his inferior mount. They talked together in low tones as they followed. "He is not so big a fool, this Arncliffe," remarked Durand. "He is quite deep, in fact. I wish it were we were trying to establish on a throne and not that foolish business in Vienna."

"I gave him his chance down there in the valley, and he laughed at me. It is not so big a fool, this Arncliffe, and quite certain that he is not a coward." "Then he would not be a safe king. Our young friend in Vienna is a good fellow."
