"She heard," I faltered.

It was some time before I discovered a man who looked as if he might belong to the place, as he sat reading, and, seemingly, by no means, inclined to understand me. When, at last, he appeared to have grasped the situation, he took my card and vanished into the house. Another man appeared, a very untidy man, whose would-be white clothes looked somewhat ashamed of themselves. He led me up a bare staircase to a still barer landingplace and from there into a sitting-room which certainly was not

Some moments elapsed before "the mother" entered. I knew her well from my observations of the family as they sat on the roof. Over a loose white wrapper ahe had thrown a bright crimson shawl, which made one feel uncomfortably warm, though, doubtless, it was meant as a reception costume. I asked after his Gonzola, on whom I had come to call. Thereupon the lady called: "Flora!"

Flore, appearing, bore a great resemblance to her mother, and was also attired in white, but her dress was tidier, and she proved decidedly p etty.

"Flore, this gentle nan wants to see Markentta": Mariquitta?"
"Yes, she is in," was the reply, and

"Miss Gonzalo is your niece?" I ven-Oh, dear no! She is staying with us because we knew her well up country before her mother died, and we wanted her to see the town and enjoy herself, so we have been taking her about."

"I was happy enough to meet her at the fancy dress ball the other evening."

"Ah, well! She did not enjoy that; she was ill afterwards; but Flora liked it."

Here we were interrupted by the appearance of that young lady and Mariquitta herself. The contrast between the two girls was very striking; nobody could have suspected Mariquitta of ancestors darker than Spaniards. She greeted me quietly, though, as she first recognized me, a deep flush had mounted to her cheek.

nized me, a deep flush had mounted to her cheek.

"I wonder if that man is bringing tea?" asked the mother, apparently of nobody in particular.

I began to talk to Mariquitta, and was glad when mother and daughter vanished, one after the other, evidently in quest of the untidy man and tea.

Then Mariquitta rose and walked to the epen door that led to the flat roof I knew so well.

"It is hot here," she said.

"We both stepped out and sat in low chairs on the roof.

"I am glad to have the opportunity of wishing you good-by," she said.

"Are you leaving us so soon?"

"Yes; I do not think I like town life, after all."

"Do you not find it lonely up country?

"To you not find it lonely up country?

You do not live by yourself?"

"An old friend of my mother lives with me. She and I have no time to be lonely, for I like to see to everything myself. Beides, I am not always there I have been to Europe twice since my parents died. I went to Spain, but my father's relations are all dead."

"Miss Gonzalo," I said, rather abrupaly, "your friends will return directly, and I have a message to deliver to you."

"Yes?" with a questioning glance.
"Yes?" with a questioning glance.
"From my friend; he has left me; he was very sorry you—overheard. He was grieved to have hurt you." I looked at her, but withdrew my glance, amazed, for the quiet girl beside me seemed of a sudden to be inspired with all the fire and dignity of her father's race.

"Grieved to have hurt me!" she re-sated, slowly. "If I had believed his dent words, if ever I could have beardent words, if ever I could have believed him, he might have hurt me. But I knew that he could not mean such protestations for more than a few hours. I knew, for I had learned. Listen. I have had a good education, and my father was one of the most refined men I ever met. I knew long ago that I was rich, and thought I had advantages even above other girls. Ah! but I did not understand. My father never brought me to this town. I was educated in a convent at home. Then my parents died, and gradually I began to understand. I might have advantages, be educated and rich; but there would ever be one barrier that no man's hand could raise—the barrier of privatice, of race. And I do not blame them; but it is hard, semetimes, and I thought there might be exceptions."

She faitered, despite the proud curve of the lip, and I felt dimly what my friend had won and—lost.

"There are exceptions, Miss Gonzalo!" I exclaimed.

I gave her my hand; she pressed it the best with a state of a room in the property of the lip, and I felt dimly what my friend had won and—lost.

"There are exceptions, Miss Gonzalo!" I exclaimed.

I gave her my hand; she pressed it lightly, but gently shook her head. Mother and daughter returned; the father and brother, too, appeared, both very dark, both very talkative. We conversed, we drank tea out of oddly assorted cups, and then the untidy man escotted cups, and then the untidy man escotted me through the gandy sitting-room.

As for chairs in wicker and chairs in cane, there are samples without number. Garden seats in different sizes are painted in rich shades of green, the smaller size being peculiarly fitted as a child's chair—a charming thing for a little one to use on a piazza.

Couches are in different shapes. A beautiful piece of English design is a good, honest, large and broad lounge, which could serve as a bed in any small room without taking up too much space, and yet look well.

Food of Fevers. The vital functions and, more directly, the natural heat of the body are manifestations of energy, which is obtained by the slow combustion or oxidation of food and the tissues into which food becomes converted. During fever the assimilation of food is diminished, while the vital functions are accelerated and the production of heat increased. In these circumstances the extra energy required is supplied by the combustion of extratissue, so that the substance of the body is rapidly consumed and progressive is beginning to incline toward convenient in every detail, suitable for any room, one of the summer fixings which gives repose, and, like all this wicker furniture, its chief merit is the true simplicity of its make, and which of course is its attractive feature.

It is evident that, other things being equal, the individual who has the greatest amount of combustible material stored in his system at the time when he is attacked by fever will offer the most prolonged resistance to its weakening effects; but such an individual, for the very reason that he is possessed of the store of material in question, provides a plentiful supply for the fever to feed upon, and, in consequence, the latter "runs high."

Young men who wear shirt fronts that are too loud to pass through a laundry safely will find interest in a paragraph stitled in a recent issue of the college paper of the Notre Dame University, the chelestic. It appeared as an answer to a question submitted by a student who had the shirt front habit, and it goes a long wars toward settling the vexing problem. Here it is:

HOW TO PRACTICE. Emisent Music Teacher's Views on This Imperiant Subject. Immbered with practical points by ment teachers in The Etude is the owing on how to practice: madica means to some merely the minutes or hours listlessly going through exercises and pieces with the satisfied feeling that one has done his duty. To others it means the hard practice of exercises and pieces with the discouraged feeling that the goal is as far off as ever. What one needs to feel after practice is the glow of conscious progress permeating his whole being, looking forward with longing to the next day's practice, instead of with the listlessness as leathing that accompanies any but

My friend left the next day; a constraint seemed to have fallen upon us.

It was a cool, pleasant evening when I stopped my carriage at the corner house I linew so well. It was not the usual calling hour, but the one at which I thought my friends were most likely to be found assembled.

It was some time before I discovered a distinct object or aim in view. It may be precision, brilliancy, velocity, evenness or lightness. It would be well if each student were to make out for himself a study plan, with the finger nertices of pieces to be himself a study plan, with the finger exercises and portions of pieces to be practiced each day, with the object aimed at in each day's practice.

At the end of the allotted time let several or all of the company be called upon to read from their cards. To the one who has the best list give an almanac or calendar in the form of a dainty booklet, with the moon's phases illustrated in gilt. Give a toy lantern for the booby prize. Some one can look over the lists and award the prizes during the rendering of the music, which should be appropriate to the occasion. The hostess might call upon one or two of her guests to relate the story or legend which is noted on their cards, and which promises, from the subject, to be short and entertaining.

This idea might be utilized for a session of a literary society, by elaborating the programme with more music and other exercises. The members should respond to roll call with a quotation about the moon. One member might have a biographical paper about Dr. Moon of Brighten, who gave light to the blind by the present convenient sys-tem of raised print. There should be a short scientific talk explaining a lunar eclipse, the tides or the phenomenon of the harvest moon. Assign this to some one who will be careful not to be too prosy and whe will illustrate it with large, plain diagrams. The last literary number should be something humorous, in which the moon shall have a prominent part.

If one's choice turns to the draped dressing table so well adapted to a country house and summer days, there are many pretty varieties as to model and drapery. Vogue illustrates a pretty example and adds a suggestion or two.

For comfort the table must be both proad and low, not rounding out too much in the front, as that pushes the chair too far from the mirror. Then, too, in draping it the curtains should be
