A Question of Home Economics.

wright with great satisfaction as she gazed through the open window at the apple trees laden with gorgeous blossoms. She loved the place and every stick and stone on it. It was hers by right of inheritance, and she would leave it for no man.

True, her old nurse Roxanna had forsaken her to become the bride of Abraham, the head gardener on the adjoining estate, and it seemed as if a land with gorgeous blossoms. She loved the place and every down to the cabin where the bride and groom were "just restin" as a bridal trip.

"When did you think of coming back, Abraham?" asked Dick as the tall figure of the negro appeared at the door.

"Whistab Dick Liust been arguin"

groom came from the house, and under the old apple; tree at the side of the cabin the most famous colored preacher in the South made them man and wife. Eleanor shook the groom by the hand and told him to guard well his precious helpmate. She kissed the hard constant attendant since babyhood. Then blinded by tears she tumped into her little runabout and started for home.

Cheers and hallelujahs rang upon the air. Bright bandannas were flung high and hickory sticks waved in circles. After twenty years of persistent courtship Roxanna and Abraham were married! Eleanor turned to look back at the happy throng and her horse shied. She was a good little horsewoman and took a firm grip on the reins, but too late! The horse had the bit in his teeth and was running at terrific speed. The light wagon rocked from one side of the road to another, Eleanor swaying with it. Down the road, past pink orchards and green fields, swaying, sand green fields, swaying, swaying—and then black nothing.

She opened her eyes to, gaze into those of the youth who had attended the wedding.

"The Dick Ewing, your next door." "I'm Dick Ewing, your next door." "So it was something else, Eleanor," be continued. "You are that something high about and when you're married—"

"Miss 'Nor, Abraham seells like in kinks I ought to work for his folks, an' when you're married—"

"Eleanor and Dick whed about and rode down the lane at ful speed. Conversation seemed to lag until they reached the spacious porch of the Uright home.

"Let's talk the matter over seriously Eleanor," said Dick. "I may call you 'Eleanor," said Dick. "I'may call you 'Eleanor," mayn't I | And let's us go back to the old-time chumminess of childhood," Eleanor looked at the fence where they had parted in anger—but she acquiesced.

"The other day as I was going to that infernal darky wedding which upstement of the road, and I reached up to gather some blossoms," began Dick.

Eleanor reached forward as if listening to an interesting story. "They were out of my reach and when I fold when t

He seemed to divine her thoughts.

"I got back the other day — just in time for the wedding," and he laughed an infectious laugh. "But this line of conversation is not getting you home. I don't know just how to do it. I don't suppose there's a sober darky this side of the Mason and Dixon line—all at the wedding drinking Wright cider. Your wagon is smashed—ob, I say, couldn't you sit my horse and I'll walk along-side? We're most there, you know."

He inspired confidence. Eleanor gathered up her torn skirt and with Dick's assitance mounted the horse. On the way home the time was spent in explanations. He had much to tell of student life in Germany. Now a in explanations. He had much to tell of student life in Germany. Now a full-fledged doctor he had come lale was to practice in the South. "I'm Dick Ewing, your next door neighbor," he explained, as he made her a bit more comfortable by propping her up. "Abraham is our gardener, you know," he continued, "and I saw you at the wedding. You seem to have forgotten me. How's 'your head, eh?"

Eleanor had known Dick Ewing when blush.

"So it was something else, Eleanor," he continued. "You are that something else, All my life I have wanted my little neighbor. As a boy I teased you, but I wanted you. As a man I missed you in Germany. I love you and I must have you. Perhaps I am reaching up too far. Perhaps you are way above me as the blossoms were."

which was waiting for her at the door. No groom attended her, for all the larkies on the place had been given a holiday that they, too, might attend the wedding. She drove down the familiar lane to the cabin in the woods, where hundreds of darkies had congregated. Only one other white person was in sight, a tall, lithe youth astride a roan horse.

Most of the colored men wore white linen suits immaculately clean and carried canes of crooked old birch and hickory. The women were arrayed to shame Solomon in all his glory. They drew aside as the two white persons came into their midst. Eleanor drove up at the side of the house and descended with the aid of many black hands. The tall youth stayed on his horse and took up a stand near the front door. Arm in arm the bride and groom came from the house, and under the cabin the most famous colored when you're married—

Eleanor was safely deposited on the front porch, with her mother almost hysterical in gratitude to their neighbor.

"I may come again, please?" he said as he extended his hand to Eleanor. "Beanor was the extended his hand to Eleanor. "The new Patric building was opened as he extended his hand to Eleanor. "Providing, of course, that I don't have to take a fiand at the garden," he added with some sarcasm.

"Oh, do come over," cordially assentiated Eleanor. "I shall probably be all pinined up the back and wearing my hair in a pigtall, because without Roxana—well, come over and see for yourself."

Dick was very busy the next day owing to the promotion of the second man as overseer during Abriham's honeymoon. The under servants resented his authority and Dick was at his wits' end to mollify them, assuring them that Agraham would be back in a few days, and peace would once more our self."

Liberal members. At an early date it is proposed to start norning sessions of the Commons, and barring the possibility of an exhausting flood of opposition campaign talk to Hansard it is hoped to have prorogation in June. One of the most important measures still to come down is a bill to amend the Civil Service Act. The bill will be a comprehensive and in some respects a radical one and will, it is hoped, remedy the defects pointed out in the report of the civil service commission. The details of the measure are now be-
