

Scene near York Mills, on Metropolitan Division.

Deer Park, above the hill, is one of the city's most picturesque suburbs, and now part of Toronto proper, being since annexed. Within this district there are numerous fine residences, the surroundings being particularly rustic. Here, too, are situated St. Michael's Cemetery (R.C.), and Separate School on the west; public school, St. Clair avenue, east, and further north again, at the forks of the road, is Christ's Church (Epis.), built close on to forty years ago, and across the way, on the east, Mount Pleasant Cemetery. From this point on the line the car touches on the way, Davisville, Eglinton and Bedford Park, the three being incorporated and known as the town of North Toronto.

Davisville, the first of these three villages, is a thriving suburb, and presents many pretty spots to the eye. From the car window one obtains a splendid view of Upper Canada College and the surrounding country.

Eglinton, which is the principal place of the three above-named, is the next point touched at, and an exceedingly beautiful place it is. The village received its name from a descendant of the house of Eglinton, in Scotland, Alexander Montgomery, who settled here in 1802. This locality, like many other districts, was the site ages ago of aboriginal settlements. It will be of interest to learn regarding Eglinton, that in December, 1837, the attention of all Canada was centred on it. Here was spilt the first blood in Upper Canada, in the struggle for responsible government. The machinations of the family compact, a body which practically controlled the Legislative Assembly, culminated in an uprising here under the leadership of William Lyon Mackenzie. Those on the Government side were known as Loyalists, while those who were opposed to the laws as