A GIRL OF GRIT.

BY MAJOR ARTHUR GRIFFITHS.

COPYRIGHT, 1900, BY R. E. FENNO & CO.

For you, and came in twice. Wanted you for something pressing. Now, I believe, he is doing the job himself. Wise man. Do it a blamed sight better than you or any man Jack of us." At this moment an office messenger came in with a huge bundle of papers, which he placed before me on my desk. They were enveloped in the usual green "jackets," which meant extreme urgency, and on the outside was written, in a big, bold hand, "Captain Wood-speak."

"You have enemies, sir," he began abruptly, and he looked so comical as he said this that I was rude enough to laugh. He was a broad shouldered, square faced, weather beaten looking man, with a florid complexion and a holy nose, irreproachably dressed in the very height of the fashion. But he had rather the air of a second class tragedian, with his long, black, curly hair and his voice so deep and so solemn as he conjured me to be serious.

"I reckon this is no laughing matter, captain. Guess your enemies will soon fix that. They mean mischief." He spoke it like a sentence of death and seemed very much in earnest, yet I could hardly take it seriously. "Such a throat scarcely affects me. You see, it is my business to risk my life. The queen has sometimes enemies, and hers are mine."

"These I speak of are altogether your own, captain—people who grudge you your new wealth." "You have heard then?" "Heard?" he cried, with great scorn. "There is nothing I do not know about you, captain. How did you enjoy the summer on the Cuyul river, and were the maps you got at Angostura very useful to you?"

"Hush, man, hush! Who and what are you? What the mischief are you driving at?" By this time we had entered Queen Anne's gate and were at the door of the office. "Is this your bureau?" he now asked. "May I not go inside with you, only for one moment? The matter is urgent. It affects you very closely. Your danger is imminent. They are bound, these enemies, to do you an injury—a terrible injury."

"Great Scott!" he roared. "You lazy, idle young colliery!" The general was tall in stature, very thin and straight, while his strong, weather beaten face—the deep brown contrasting sharply with the bristling white mustaches and long, projecting eyebrows, over fierce, steely blue eyes—commanded respect.

"He began on me at once. 'By the Lord Harry, this won't do, Wood!' he cried, with amazing volubility and force. 'What have you got to say for yourself? Slept late? Of course you will sleep late if you waste the night flirting and philandering with that little madcap devil, Frida Fairholme. But I tell you, I won't have the business of this office neglected. Now you are late for parade, and you know I insist upon punctuality. And I practice what I preach. I was here as the clock struck 10 this morning, and I'd already been to Hounslow and back on my 'bike. But there, you'll end by putting me out of temper. Don't do it again.'"

"I won't, Sir Charles," I said meekly, yet wondering why I, a man of millions, submitted to such slavery, and I turned to go. "Ah, by the way, Wood, bring me that report of yours, will you, on the defense of the Canadian frontier? It is ready, I presume?" "Well, no, Sir Charles, not quite. I have been delayed by—"

ing, guard-mounting routine, and when you are grizzling your soul out in that beastly tropical hole, Bermuda, you may be sorry for the chance you've lost. Go away, I say. I've done with you. I hate the very sight of you." And I went, meaning in my rage—for I, too, had become furiously angry—to take him at his word and walk straight out of the house. But custom is strong. The spirit of subordination, of obedience, the soldierly sense of duty, when once imbued, are not to be shaken off in a second. When I regained my desk and saw the papers there, I remembered that I was bound in honor to fulfill my obligations. My chief had, no doubt, gone too far, but that did not release me. Before I took any further steps I must first complete my work.

There was not much wanting to finish my report on the Canadian frontier, and I did it out of hand. Then I sent it in to the chief and prepared to tackle the second set of papers, which proved to be a scheme, marked "strictly confidential," for a combined attack upon New York by sea and land. (Our political relations at that particular moment were greatly strained. There were rumors of grave disagreement, if nothing worse.) But now I noticed the word "speak," and I knew that I must take verbal instructions before I set to work. I must face my irascible chief again, and I had no great fancy for it. However, it must come sooner or later, so I scribbled a few words on a sheet of foolscap and went in.

The general was at his standing desk (he seldom sat down) pouring over my other report, but he looked round as I entered and nodded pleasantly. Bright sunshine had already succeeded the always fugitive storms in his hasty temperament. "This will do first rate, Wood. There are only one or two points that need amplification," and we went over the items together.

Then I asked him about the other matter, and soon heard all I wanted to know. I can set down nothing of this here, for the whole affair was very secret and particular—of vital interest to two great countries—and Sir Charles impressed it on me very earnestly that the paper and plans must on no account pass out of my possession. "You may have to work on the scheme at your own diggings, for it must go in by the end of the week. But pray be most careful. Lock up the papers in your dispatch box at night."

A Sad Accident

Halifax, May 21—A cable states that the Maitland barque Savona has put into Montevideo with the captain and three of his crew dead. They were killed by an immense wave which boarded the ship. The captain, Hedley McDougall, was a native of Maitland, Hans county, and was forty-two years old. Mrs. McDougall was with her husband en route from Australia to Rotterdam. She expects to start for home at once.
