"I've got a farm that I want to trade for city lot," he explained. "My oldest girl ints a taste of city life and the excitements of the great metropolis, as she calls I'm satisfied with the farm myself, but women folks want to live in town."
"Very well, sir," says the agent, blandly, we can suit you. About how high a figure in you go?"

"we can suit you. About how high a figure can you go?"

"Well, about a three-thousand-dollar lot. My farm is worth all of that."

"Call around this afternoon," said the agent, "and I will take you to see some of the finest city lots in Watchitowatchit."

Promptly at the time fixed the old man presented himself at the office of the agent, whose team was at the door, a span of horses and a buggy.

"Get right in, and we'll ride out to the lots," he said, politely.

Soon the avenue began to merge into the prairie road, the houses grew farther and farther apart, until they finally disappeared, and the agent and the farmer were riding through the open prairie dotted occasionally with farm buildings, and still the agent urged his horses, as if he were anxious to get tack to his office before dark. Well, well," thought the farmer, "this is the great metropolis, is it?" ****

Finally, after driving some ten miles, the agent drew rein beside a piece of unbroken prairie, where just above the grass could be seen rows of red-painted stakes driven into designate the lines of house lots. The piece covered about five acres. "There!" said the agent, with a grand sweep of his hand, "there is one of the finest city squares in the market. This corner lot here, twenty-five feet front, is quoted at three thousand five hundred dollars. We will let you have it for three thousand dollars, the value of your farm." "Mister," said the agriculturist, slowly getting down out of the buggy, "do you see that farm-house about two miles back on the road we've just come over, toward the city? That is my farm, and I don't know as I want to trade to-day for this city lot. I think if I start now I shall get back there best milkin'time. I've got all I want out it this boom."

HOW TO MAKE BEDS.

abtful whether more than half the pers in the land know how to make neuscicepers in the land know how to make up a bed in the right way, simple as the peration may appear, writes Maria Parloa in the Housewife. It is necessary that the springs and mattresses be even, that the sheets be long enough, and that the sheets be long enough, too. The sheets in the about eight feet long.

The sheet has been supported by the control of the c cas damage, ie room and bedding air for an hou surface. Now spread the under sheet bothly over the mattress and bolster, be-are 'ul to have enough margin for tuck-under the bolster. Tuck the cloth under mattress at the sides and foot. Next ad the top sheet on the bed, being carereast the top sneet on the bed, being care-it tuck a generous piece under the mat-ces at the foot. Nothing is more annoy-g than to have the covering drawn off the et in the night, yet this is likely to happen any time if the upper sheet is not tucked least a foot under the mattress.

tany time it the upper since is not timed.

After the top sheet come the blankets.

After the top sheet come the blankets, of they are double, have the opening ome at the head of the bed; then, if it becomes too warm in the night, half of the lanket can without trouble be thrown ack, whereas, if the closed end be at the top me is ablieful to get un to make the change. back, whereas, it me closed end be at the top one is obliged to get up to make the change. It is surprising how often this little point in housekeeping is overlooked, even in houses where one expects the best of management. When the blankets are on, put on the suread, taking nains to get it needer the aven When the blankets are on put on the spread, taking pains to get it perfectly even and smoqth. Tuck the spread in at the foot and tuckin between the springs and sidepiece of the bed the top sheet, blankets and spread, getting the sides perfectly smooth. Now turn the spread back so that it shall come even with the bottom of the bolster. Turn the blanket back on this, and turn the sheet last. To have the hem come right side up when folded back, the sheet should be spread with the right side down. See that all the lines are straight, and place the pillows on their sides on the bolster. Doubtless many readers will consider this as exceedingly elementary, but there seems to be much need of just such instruction in many households.

A JUVENILE CASUIST.

How He Drove His Grandmother to a Foint of Distraction.

The age is nothing if not skeptical, says the Boston Courier, and out of the mouths of babes and sucklings come nowadays the most unorthodox sentiments.

Little George has attained to the mature age of seven, and having enjoyed the advantages of a pious education, he is well up in the theological subtleties which it is in such a course of instruction felt proper to stuff into young heads. His especial delight is in bringing them forward, tangled and twisted, with the intent therein to ensare his worthy grandmother, who holds to the faith of fifty years ago with unshaken fidelity.

to the faith of fitty years ago with unshaken fidefity.

"Grandmother," he said the other day, "gou say that one has to give an account for every thing he says!" "Yes, George," she "replied, (solemnly; "for every fidle word, even, one must give an account in judgment."

"And you said, grandma, that all the influence counts, too."

"Yes, all the influence.

"Well, if I said something in a room, and I ddin't know there was any one near-enough to hear, it wouldn't be fair to blame me if somebody was really in the next room and heard me and was made wicked."

"But you shouldn't say things that would make people wicked, even when you are alone."

"But it might not be any thing wicked," persisted the boy, "Suppose a man had made up his mind to steal something and he didn't know where it was, and I told where it was wen I ddn't know he was there or Minard's Liniment is the Best

A SHARK'S DINNER

How a Foolhardy Young Pennsylvanian Courted Destruction.

We had been fishing for sea bass in Great Egg Harbor, says the Detroit Free Press, and had hauled in our lines to eat luncheon, when, glancing over the port-quarter of the yacht, I encountered the eyes of a shark. His snout and head were there, of course, but I scarcely saw any thing but the eyes. The water was as clear as glass, and he was not more than two feet above the surface. Such eyes! They hadn't the fire of a serpent's nor the glassy green of a mad dog's, but there was something so devilish in the way he stared at me—some thing so murderous and maliguant—that I yelled right out and was made the butt of ridicule. One and all, except the sailor in charge of the boat, vigorously denied that I had seen a shark. When he was appealed to, he soborly replied:

"I can not say, out I know that man-esters come in here."

We had with us a young man from West a Foolhardy Young Pennsyl Courted Destruction.

"I can not say, out I know that man-eaters come in here."

We had with us a young man from Western Pennsylvania, a tall, raw-boned, demonstrative chap, whose clatter no one could keep still when we had our lines out. When we had finished luncheon he uttered another sneer at my pale face, pulled off his coat and gatiers, and, standing up on the rail, he crowed like a cock and shouted:

"I'm going to give that shark a chance t get a good dinner!"

With that he sprang overboard and swam about fifty feet. There was only a ruffle of a sea on, and he was a swimmer who would have thought nothing of a mile pull. The boatman shouted to him to come back, but the others laughed and the swimmer laughed with them. I was standing up in the cockpit, looking over and beyond the man, when I saw a black object riding on the surface. It looked to me like a small duck, and I was wondering how it moved so swiftly, when it suddenly disappeared. Five seconds later the swimmer heaved himself up breast high, fiung his arms over his head, and uttered a scream which yet rings in my ears. Then he disappeared, and the awful silence among us was broken by the voice of the boatman, saying:
"He has been pulled down by a mancater!"

FOR MARRIED PEOPLE.

Why Husbands and Wives Should Study Each Other's Weak Points.

Why Husbands and Wives Should Study Each Other's Weak Points.

It has been well said that married couples should study each other's weak points for the same reason that the skaters look out for air-holes in the ice—in order to keep clear of them. Unfortunately, however, they often use their knowledge of such tender spots for a very different purpose, sparing ne pains to give them a rub on every possible occasion. Hence "domestic difficulties" innumerable.

Women, says the New York Ledger, have immense power over the men-creatures, and they know it; but, alas! they do not always exercise their influence wisely. The wife and mother should be the primary orb of the domestic system, the center of attraction to all the members of the family group—for, when wives are "repellent bodies," away go husbands and fathers and sons, flying off at a tangent into space.

Men should remember that many of our privileges are founded on compromises and concessions. It is so in the world political and the policy that makes a state prosperous and happy is not bad as a home policy. Therefore, O Benedies, it thou wouldst acquire the right to ask a friend to dinner without notice, neglect not to respond favorably when the partner of thy joys and sorrows hints at a new bonnet or a new silk dress. It is a faithful saying that the "wife's want is the husband's opportunity," and the converse of the proverb is also true. It is one of the misfortunes of unregulated families that both wife and husband insist upon having the last word. Nothing can be more improper. The last word is an "infernal machine," and married foil should no more struggle for it than for hundred-pound shell with the fuse lighted. "infernal machine," and married foil should no more struggle for it than for hundred-pound shell with the fuse lighted. To the married ladies who find their spouses not quiet so perfect as they had supposed them to be during the billing and cooing period, we would sugcest that angels have not been permitted to wed with women since the flood.
