SCRAP BOOK POETRY

AN UP-TO-DATE CLASSIC.

The house where I was born,
It had a red-faced janitor,
Whose eyes spake sullen scorn
Who every time I passed him by Returning from the street
Said vitriolic things about
The mud upon my feet.

I remember, I remember,
The flat across the hall,
Where dwelt a crusty bachelor
Who'd curse me when I'd squall;
And in the suites below us dwelt remember, I remember, The folks who lived above The folks who lived above On whom my patient parents looked Witk anything but love.

The mother played the violin,
The son the organette,
While pater practiced night and day
Upon a brass cornet.

I remember, I remember,
The things my daddy said
The day the brand new talkerphone
Was started overhead;
And how my mother wept about
The whole depraved kibosh
When those who lived next door us s
Three-quarters of our wash.

I remember, I remember,
The boys across the way
Who used to punch me on the nose
At least three times a day—
It may be childish ignorance,
It may be I'm obtuse,
But when I think of those old days
I hate them like the deuce!
—New York Sun.
The prayer, "Give me riches and righteousness," easily gets shortened at the wrong end.

with the exception of the speed trials, in which very much trouble was experienced by the judge in getting the horses away to a good start. That trouble was due to the narrow track. While the speed trials were being run off, much difficulty was experienced in keeping the course clear. In one instance a man refused to drive his horse off the track, and when he was forced to do so started to urge his right by might. He had not time to demonstrate his fistic abilities before the constable's gentle touch was felt and he was forced to leave the ground. While the races were on, W. O. Sealey, M. P., was in the grand stand with the judges, and just as the excitement was at fever heat, a crackling of wood was heard and the next minute Mr. Sealey was standing on the ground, laughing at the quick descent he had made.
