AN APOLOGY FOR DYNAMITE. A New York Fashionable Journal Hold that it is a Boon to Mankind. A sensation has just been raised in Irish-American circles across the line by the publication of an apology for dynamite as the leading article of the New York organ of tashionable society, the Home Journal. The following is the singular production:

the revolution it is effecting in the arts of offence and defence. As gunpowder and fifled cannon and railroads changed the former methods of war, so this new agent has shifted again the balance of power, reducing still further the supremacy of brut force and mere numbers. Great armies and vast cities are, indeed, a source of weak ness in dynamite warfare, furnishing as they must, the mest vulnerable points of attack for its wholesale destruction. A barren rock in the secret mountains of Switzer land, with its dynamite laboratory and con voys by air or land, may set at naught the standing armies of the proud Gern the standing armies of the proud German empire, and drop annihilation unon its walled cities at any hour by night or day. At this moment a single warefarer, with dynamite in his pocket, throws the cities of Enlgand in greater terror than would an army of a hundred thousand men landing at Dover, with only the ordinary weapons of guns and sabres. A handful of hunted, homelees nihilists are able to terrorize all the Bussians forcing its emperor to live the

All triumphs of science and invention work inevitably in the end for the people. It is these scientific victories which have made the populace of to day other than the slaves and chattels of the ancient civilizations. But for these "the divine right of kings" would still dominate the world, and the great mass would be but cheap material to build the tombs for the Pharaohs. Every solvence in science has given the people an advance in science has given the people an additional hold of the sceptre of power. Sometimes by an increase of the general wealth, as in the case of the steam engine, the loom, the sewing machine, sometimes by a general multiplication of the means of destruction, as in the invention of gunpowder, cannon, and fire-arms, making a single man often more formidable than a phalanx of ancient swordsmen. Every increase in the destructiveness of weapons of war has brought increased respect and im-portance for the individual war-maker. Thus to-day the poorest nihilist with his dynamite is an object of more consideration from the czar and his nobles than would be forty thousand serfs of the olden time armed simply with staves and forks. As a direct consequence the case of these poor malcontents would be more heeded than it has been heretofore. Not even proud England can escape the alternative. She may resist for a time and try laws of excessive rigor, but at last she will come to respect this hidden force and find it wiser and cheaper to cultivate the Irishman's good will than his ill will. Thus it will be der and destruction has cleared away, that there will follow throughout the world a more ready disposition on the part of governments to listen to the petition of the hunblest classes of the community and see that no burdens of unjust laws are maddening them to revolt. The consequence will be an era of comparative peace and good will, greater stability and less frequent revolutions in governments, and the eventual abolition of evidently be achieved most directly by some agency like the perfected dynamire bomb and electrical battery, which will make great armies useless, make them mere targets for destruction en masse, instead of reserves of strength. In the future, little corps of engineers with telescope, bat-teries and balloons, will take the place of the lumbering armies of the past, and finish in a few days, perhaps hours, what in olden times would have been a thirty years' war. These effects will be observed wherever the dynamite wave reaches; horror and attempts at repression at first, then the better counsels of discretion and humanity, and at last a genuine recognition of the brotherhood of the despised classcs, and a sincere purpose to relieve their estate and remove from them all unjust discriminations. We say unjust discriminations, for it is incredible that all flance of principle? Happily the case is not one to call for the interposition of dynamite, but the discriminations are irritating to the classes discriminated against, and tend to alienate them from the state which they should look up to as a sure protector and love as a second father. Without such regard from the humblest, from the great mass of the people, no government can stand in entire security. And i will be well for our legislators to beed the warning that comes to us from England, and to give due diligence to lunting our from our statute books all traces of viciou, partial, and supe fluous law, and especially such as tend to keep up the old antagonism between the poor and the rich.

homeless nihilists are able to terrorize all the Russians, forcing its emperor to live the life of a fugitive and making his very coronation a problem of chance. Jupiter with his lightnings was scarcely more a master of the ancent world than is the mob with its bomb of dynamite, the avenging Fate of modern monarchies.

At first glance the dynamite bomb seems an implement of fiends, but a closer view discovers in it a potent minister of good. All triumphs of science and invention work inevitably in the end for the people. It is this discontent, this unanimity of outry, should appear through all Europe without some serious justification in bad laws. It is not human nature to wince without pain; and in all ages the common people have been more ready to accept and endure impositions than to rebel without cause against fair and equal institutions. It is a weakness in all governments to favor the rich at the expense of the poor. Monarchies are
