Maize should be fed sparingly, being fattening rather than egg producing. Bone should always be provided, particularly during the moult.

In building a hen-house all the inside furniture should be made to be easily removed and taken apart. Roosts and nests and boxes that are nailed on catch a good deal of dirt around the fastenings, and become perfect breeding places for lice. But, if they can be easily got at, and cleaned and kerosened, such trouble will be avoided.

It is mostly the late moulting fowls which are laying the eggs now, but these fowls will probably stop altogether at the first really cold snap and lay no more until spring. The only old hens which are likely to lay in winter are those which moult early and get over it quickly. The late moulters might as well be sold off when they stop laying.

The laying of soft eggs, that is eggs covered with a membrane rather than a shell, is easily ascribed to over-fatness, but some hens persist in the habit, whether fat or lean, even if well supplied with lime, and such fowls are doubtless affected with chronic disorder of the organs of reproduction. While these are all right for table poultry they are good for nothing else. If several hens in a flock lay soft eggs it is a sure sign of over-feeding.

Hens can be crowded and get along somewhat, but there is no sense nor profit in it beyond a certain limit. Ten square feet to a fowl in a winter pen is the least allowance that pays. The roosting pen should have about
