The report says that only 17 girls are now in the school. One of these will be leaving shortly, "reducing us to a number quite insufficient to pay expenses, which are kept so low as to puzzle the mind of even the most economical person."

There was no case of sickness to report.

REPORT OF THE BOARD.

In a few remarks preparatory to the unveiling, Mr. O. A. Howland tendered the high appreciation of the family for the kind remembrance and referred warmly to the persistent labors of his late brother's co-workers in instituting the Industrial School. He regretted to hear that a feeling or coldness was being manifested by some of those at the head of affairs toward the institution. There ought to be no conflict and he hoped to see better unity in the work of our charitable institutions. He suggested the appointment of some common authority in the form of, say, a charity commissioner. mon made a somewhat lengthy reference to the loss sustained by the church in the recent death of the Archbishop of Canterbury. Speaking from personal knowledge of the deceased prelate the preacher said the Archbishop's death "was an irreparable loss to the Anglican Church throughout the universe." He was a man whom all men loved for the "saintliness and humility of his beautiful character." After an account of the work of the deceased, the preacher concluded an impressive sermon with the words: "Death is a preacher whom all are obliged to listen to whether they will or no."

THE MEMORIAL TABLET, The handsome brass tablet was then unveiled, and this is the inscription

"If there were no boys and girls requiring the discipline and industrial training of schools like these we would be glad and rejoice at the decrease of the numbers in attendance. We are convinced, however, by evidence that is undoubted that there are a large number of boys that are at present a source of annoyance and danger to the community, and that would be saved from almost certain ruin if they were placed in an industrial school. Among this number is a class known as persistent truants, for whom the law does not appear to make proper

Since these schools were first opened the number of children committed to their care has been 601 boys and 46 girls. Of these 385 boys and 29 girls have gone out from the schools, leaving an attendance at the present time of 116 boys and 17 girls. The attendance one year ago was 195 boys and 24 girls. We should mention, however, that 20 boys who are Roman Catholies were transferred to St. John's Industrial School at Biantyre by order of the Ontario Government. Since Jan. 1, this year, 24 boys have entered the Victoria Industrial School, only four of whom came from the city of Toronto.

We hope through the generosity of the friends of the school to be placed in a position to make the hall in every sense worthy of the institution in the near furture.

At the conclusion of the meeting the final stroke for freedom. Not until this struggle is ended, and the people of Cuba attain their independence will the world know how the truth has been systematically suppressed.

Within the past week Weyler was notified by Premier Canovas not to kill so many, as it was attracting attention. within the past week Weyler was notified by Premier Canovas not to kill so many, as it was attracting attention. Whatever executions now take place are in secret. The Spanish commanders under Weyler are beginning to show the white feather. The Royal troops in the Province of Havana are never moved in bodies of less than a thousand. They are afraid to venture out with a smaller number. General Weyler now proposes as his coup de grace to surround the impregnable heights held by Maceo and wait for the Cuban general to come down, No one knows better than Weyler that Maceo cannot be dislodged from his position. The advance guard of Gomez, I have no doubt, is at this moment in the Province of Santa Clara or on its border, and the most important engagement of the revolution is not far off. The Spaniards must meet them, and it will be the Waterloo of the Spanish army on the continent of America."
