

THE CHIMES OF ST. MARY'S

It was Christmas Eve. The bells of St. Mary's in the mountain village of Claster pealed out the fact in joyful numbers. The hills caught up the clang and sent it back and forth in a thousand reverberations. Everything about the village betokened preparations for the merriment of the season. The street on which the stores were located, was crowded, and foot passengers loaded with bundles jostled each other in good-natured confusion.

"Surely, sir, this is his town. He's within himself this minute," pointing to the church as he spoke. "I thought I should probably find him here. He is training a choir of boys, or dressing a tree for the village children?" "Sure, sir, you're acquainted with his pleasant ways?" said the man; and then continued: "He finished with the boys this afternoon. There are visitors at the 'crags.' One of the young ladies sings like an angel. She's within, too. She's going to sing on the morrow."

At that moment a Gloria, sung in a purring voice of rare richness and purity, rang out into the night, and without further question the gentleman stepped inside the half-open door. There was only one light burning; that was in the organ loft, hence he stood entirely unobserved, and covered by the shadows. There were three persons in the choir, Martin Fairburn and two ladies. The soloist was a young woman, she had placed her long cape veil hung down over it. She was remarkably fair and there was an expression of rapt devotion on her face as she sang.

I've gone on just about as I used to. Mother bought this place about it seemed as if it might come from a hundred different sources. I suppose did not seem either surprised or embarrassed that he had joined her. Perhaps she had expected her to do so. Three years ago that very night he had stood with her at the altar, and looked at the stars and listened to the chimes. He had had her hand in his. The recollection was so vivid that he could feel their thrilling touch that moment. Had she entirely forgotten? Had she handed over so many lovers to her sister-in-law since then that the episode which had marked his life was effaced from her memory? She was gazing at the stars and the white towering mountains. She looked thoroughly happy and absorbed with her present surroundings. Suddenly she glanced at her watch; it was five minutes past twelve. She turned to the altar, a kindly expression in her luminous eyes.

"I wish you a 'Merry Christmas,'" she said. He bowed in silent thanks. He was pained. He should not so ignore the past. "Mrs. Adrian," he said, "it is a man's regular recreation when he has closed a chapter under the name of 'What is written, to turn a leaf and unexpectedly find 'to be continued.'"

"The chimes leapt and rang in a wonderful confusion of sweet sounds. 'I love those chimes of St. Mary's,'" she said, quite irrelevantly. "Yet he felt sure she had heard him. Then Fairburn came out with his arm linked to Mrs. Adrian's, and they were all so happy at New! So you remember, Mr. Russell! Imogene and I have not forgotten. Those were halcyon days!"

and was feeling it on sugar plums. Both gentlemen looked as if they had been looking about for some time, and detected in the act. She did not even seem to be surprised or embarrassed that he had joined her. Perhaps she had expected her to do so.
