ROME.

The Roman Correspondent of the N. Y. Tablet, furnishes the following account of an attack upon a Church in Rome, by the Italian Nationalists:—

Early on Friday morning crowds began to gather round the Gesù, which greatly increased as the day advanced towards noon. As early as 10 a. m. the Piazza and adjacent streets were filled with people, yet not a single policeman was on the spot.

The Diletti, in referring to the fact, is compelled to exclaim—"We cannot refrain from greatly commending the measures taken for not only preventing the occurrence of such a riot, but also for preventing the occurrence of such a riot."

Towards 12 o'clock the sermon ended, and the people began to issue from the church. Their appearance at the doors was the signal for the riots to recommence. They were received with hoosings, hissing, yells, stonings, etc.

In a few moments the tumult was general. Gases were whizzing through the air, stiletts and knives were flying, etc. etc. When the tumult had reached its highest, several companies of policemen, National Guards, and two companies of the 62nd regiment came up.

A multitude of arrests were made among the Papalists, while the Garibaldini were allowed to riot to their heart's content. While the arresting was going on, those of the Papalists that could, took advantage of the confusion and absented themselves, so that in a short time the Garibaldini were left in sole possession of the field.

At this moment the authorities read the Riot Act. The mob did not mind it. The soldiers pointed their bayonets and marched in from one end of the street to the other. No one was hurt. The mob and they seemed to have understood each other. As the soldiers came up, the mob gave way, but fell in again behind them as soon as they had passed by, hooting and yelling as before.

Such was the scene that took place outside the church, but it was nothing to what took place within. When the rioting commenced outside, the doors of the church were closed to prevent the rioters from entering. A multitude of men, women and children had remained inside for safety.

When the tumult outside appeared to have somewhat abated, the doors were again opened to let them out. As soon as this was done, the soldiers, with pointed bayonets, and policemen and National Guards, with drawn swords, rushed in, and the rioters, in a moment, were reduced to a degree. One poor boy ran screaming into the Sanctuary, where a priest was saying Mass. This, however, did not save him. The police followed him, and with horrid imprecations and blasphemies, dragged him forth, helping him along with thrusts from their swords.

The priest, also, who was at the altar, was dragged from the altar. It was with difficulty he prevailed on them to let him finish the Mass. When he had finished it, he was arrested, and carried off, amidst the yells and howls of the rabble, to Monte Citorio, where they kept him until about four in the evening, when he was liberated, not having tasted food since early in the morning, and then only having taken a few ounces that are allowed on fasting days.

When arrested, he at first refused to unvest, but wanted them to take him as he was; but the officers, in a moment, were so horribly that at last he complied.

In the evening the scenes at the Gesù were repeated at the Church of St. Andrea delle Fratte, near Propaganda. And later on in the night the Garibaldini forming themselves into procession, marched through the streets crying:—"Down with the Jesuits," "Hurrah for the King," "Down with the Colleges," "Hurrah for Prince Umberto," "Hurrah for Princess Margherita," "Death to the Priests," "Down with the Vatican," "Down with the religion of Christ," "Hurrah for Protestantism," "Down with Catholicity," and a hundred and one other cries of the same sort, hurled up with a host of blasphemies so horrible that they bear not the mentioning.

This procession paraded the greater part of the city, passing on its march the palace of the Royal Highnesses and drawing up before the Gesù, which they proceeded to attack. But while they were engaged in their assault, an indignity was offered to their tri-colored flag, a vessel of low degree being emptied on it from a neighboring window. This at once drew their attention from the Gesù, to a private house, which at first they determined on demolishing, but on further consultation, they concluded on separating peacefully, and on laying their cause before Parliament, and demanding the immediate expulsion of the Jesuits.

After breaking up the windows, they set fire to the building, and the flames, which were extinguished by the fire department, were extinguished by the fire department, and the flames, which were extinguished by the fire department, were extinguished by the fire department.

Severed his right arm in the Police Court yesterday, a boy named George Stammers was sentenced to three years in the Reformatory for stealing money from his mother.

ITALIAN SKETCHES.

It was a grievous oversight on my part, and I ought to have known better than to make it. On my book-shelf lay a calendar for the current year, with the feast of St. Michael marked in prominent characters, and I heard as I was dressing, the far-off peals of the Rocca bells, floating musically down the Tuscan hills in the air of that mild September morning, announcing to neighboring villages that the festival of the Guardian Archangel had dawned.

With all these remembrances of the day, and ten years experience of the generally successful efforts of Lucifer and his pupils, to create the direct confusion in the elements on the feast of their atonement, I was to be seen splashing into the little village of Ariccia in the midst of one of the fiercest thunderstorms anyone ever had the misfortune to be abroad in. My ears were deafened by the peals, my eyes dazzled by the lightning, and my whole exterior agitated by the shock that poured unintermittently. It certainly was a grievous oversight on my part, St. Michael, and here was I enjoying the triumph and glory of my triumph, when I heard as I was dressing, the far-off peals of the Rocca bells, floating musically down the Tuscan hills in the air of that mild September morning, announcing to neighboring villages that the festival of the Guardian Archangel had dawned.
