The Braes of Yarrow

The silence was broken by Yetholm Will.

The silence was broken by Yetholm Will.

Burn me, lads, but we may as weel dee at the hands o' the witch here, as be swung up by the maister when we get hame again, for being cowed by a woman and a single man.

On them, lads, and doon wi' them.'

A shout was raised, and in concurrence with their comrade's advice there was a movement as if to renew the attack.

'Hand a wee; hand a wee,' interrupted the boarse voice of Ding.a'-Doon, now grown feello as if the bulky form was exnasted at last.

In surprise the men looked in the direction whence the voice came, and saw the giant ying, as it seemed helpless, at the feet of his love.

Yetholm Will sad Orsig with a growl of amaze and rage sprang to his side and tried to raise him from the ground.
Ye needing fash yoursels aboot me, lads,' groaned the exhausted Dings.'Deop.' I'm bye wi' it. But it was in fair fecht, and, damn it, but if he had kilt me swenty times, I'll say he's a braw chiel an' didna get fair play.

fair fecht, but let ye the chiel gang—damn
him, he's spoiled me.
Dings.'Doon's heast fell heavaly back on Oraig's shoulder, and in the performance of the one really generous act which his blint stupidity and fidelity to his foster-brother permitted him to do in his life, Pasp Scott, the giant, died.
There was gloomy dismay on the visages

giant, died.

There was gloomy diamay on the visages of the Borderers for Ding-a-Doon had been liked by them for his simplicity, and admired on account of his extraordinary strength and dogged courage. To see him die now by the hand of a mere youth—one who was the fee of their chief, and whose death they had been sent to accomplish—aroused their fiercest passions. Besides they had some reason to dread the wrath of the master when they returned and told him what had happened.

Man they feeling the brief lull Kirsty Hyslop said in a hasty undertone to Gilbert—
'Pick up your horn and wind a blast loud as your lungs will blow—there may be friends near by now.
Gilbert picked up the horn which in the contest had fallen from Ding.a'.Doon.
'What signal?'
'The call.'

'The call'
The put the horn to his lips, and as the sound rang through the forest, Yetholm Will started to his feet.
'Lads', he shouted, 'we maun avenge the death of Pate Scott before we look again on Tushielaw Tower.

The words were answered by a shout of assent, and the men rushed furiously at the witch and the man she was endeavouring to shield.

witch and the man she was endeavouring to shield.

Recognising that the spell of her authority was broken, and hearing the sound of a bugle at no great distance, she waved the torch round her head as if to serve as a signal to guide those who might be approaching, and then dashed it upon the ground extinguishing it with her foot.

A-moment of total darkness followed. She seized Gilbert by the arm and dragged him away from the place.

'It is certain death to bide here,' she hissed in his ear.

He submitted, and she guided him by many turnings through the trees toward the bridle path. Tracked by the crackling of branches they were closely pursued by the enraged mosatroopers, who with fierce oaths cursed every obstale to their vengeance.

In the excitement of pursuit none of them heard the fast approaching hooftreads of horses.

When the fugitives passed out upon the bridle path they were seen at once by the pursuers, who rushed at them with furious yells.

But here they were encountered by seven horsenen, who laid about them with so much skill and good will that after a brief skirmish the tide of affairs was completely turned. The mosstroopers became the fugitives and took to the shelter of the woods.

The Revolution, "Woman's Rights" organ, tells us triumphantly of a Woman Farmer of Pekin, Niagara Co., N. Y. State—a Mrs. Roberts, "Her family," says the Revolution, "consisted of herself, husband, seven girls and two boys." She and her girls worked in the field, "side by side with the men," and the result was that the girls came to "measure across the shoulders and round the waist as much as any common sized man." The result is scarcely encouraging, however excellent the principle.

An American paper contains an advertisement of a monstrous hog for sale, which stands 3 feet 8 inches in height, is feet 6 inches in length, 8 feet in girdth, and weighs about 1,200 pounds. It is supposed to be the largest hog in the United States. We believe this hog was raised by Mr. James Lunny, formerly a resident of the township of Ancaster.
