"Lay the child on the bed," said the doctor to the weeping woman, "and cover his face. I will go and meet her. Do not let her hear you sob if you can help it."

He spoke so quietly that the woman's agitation was calmed at once, and she followed his directions without a sound; but in his own heart there was a deadly followed his directions without a sound; but in his own heart there was a deadly anguish. That moment when he stood waiting for Gladys at the top of the stairs was the bitterest of his life.

She came up with the same light elastic step. Would she never reach him? She glanced up, smilingly, at the tall figure on the landing.

"What, you have been looking in on my chicks in my absence, doctor?" she cried, gayly. Then, as she reached his side, and saw the deadly pallor of his bronzed face, a change came over her own, and she laid her hand on his arm in affectionate anxiety.

Gladys knelt beside the bed and kissed Gladys knelt beside the bed and kissed the little hands, still with dry eyes. "My little Tom!" she said, softly. "No, doctor, you need not fear. I do not need to see his face—I shall never lose it from before my eyes."

There was the sound of a door opening on the other side of the nursery. Gladys started.
"It is reach byshead." gaid Stephen.

Gladys started.
"It is your husband," said Stephen, looking anxiously at her. "Will you not go to him?"
"My husband!" she repeated, in a hard voice, unlike her own. "And he came back for the child after I was gone! God forgive him! I never can." She hid her face in the pillow beside which she was kneeling.

Stephen stood for a moment, irresolute.
"Will you not go to your husband, Mrs.

her. "I feel anxious about him, and I must go, but you are needed quite as much as I."
"Yes, go," she answered, coldly, still keeping her face averted. "Go, but do not ask me to come." And Stephen went

There are no secrets in such hours from the physician; he may read all hearts if he will, and, if his own be a tender one, he pays dearly for the bitter privilege. To Stephen's loyal, deephearted nature, the alienation between husband and wife at that supreme moment of grief brought a crushing sense of inisery that wrung his very soul.

It was easier to minister to Mr. Amory's sorrow than to Gladys. The coid, formal man was quite breken down; he wept for his boy in a passion of grief that was all the more painful to witness for the remorse mingled with it, clinging to Stephen as if there were some soothing power in his strong, friendly arm. The doctor did not leave him until he had dropped into an uneasy sleep, worn out by the violence of his grief.

Gladys was still kneeling where he had left her, her face buried in the pillow. Stephen stood silently beside her, his heart full of sympatny which he was powerless to express. Suddenly a thought came to him and he left the room. A moment after Gladys heard a faint baby murmur, and, looking up, saw little Amy in the doctor's arms, rubbing her soft cheek against his, and cooing her satisfaction in baby fashion.

She held out her arms with a sudden burst of tears.

"Oh, my little girl! I had forgotten her! Give her to me—my one little child!"

Those were tears that Stephen did not wish to check. He stole out of the nursery and walked for a long hour up and down the hall, waiting, though for what

At last she came softly out and laid her hand again on his arm.

"I can go to him now," she said gently, "and you need not be afraid to leave me. Thank you, my true-hearted friend, for your reminder."

"I spoke for your own sake," said Stephen under his breath. He went softly downstairs, feeling that there was no more need for his presence.

"Best not take these things too much "Best not take these things too much to heart."

The old doctor had been silently watching his son, who sat opposite him sunk down in his arm-chair, his chin on his breast, wrapt in a moody reverie, and so abstracted that he did not even know he was silent. They were sitting together in the smoking-room as they usually did for a cosy after-dinner hour of chat, perhaps the pleasantest time in the day to both, for there was the heartiest sympathy and affection between father and son with enough unlikeness to make the on with enough unlikeness to make the scussion of the day's occupations fresh and racy.

Stephen started, pushing back his heavy hair from his forehead with a gesture habitual to him.
"If one begins by making a private burden of the ills of humanity," said the doctor, whose tender old heart had been bleeding for Gladys all the evening, "we doctors should be buried fathoms deep! Who knows what evils that child may and racy. *

"Well, my boy," said the old doctor, throwing himself back in his chair with a sigh, "there is no way of getting over it unless you take to Stoic philosophy. I've tried that myself as a means of self-defence against other people's troubles, but I'm afraid you're not enough of a humbug for it, for, to tell the truth, it never did me much good."

Stephen smiled absently, and, raising, brought a light for his father's cigar. He did not himself smoke that evening, but walked thoughtfully up and down the room, his arms behind his back and a heavy cloud on his brow. He looked haggard and overworked as his father had never before seen him; but, when the office-bell rang, he started to the door as if it were a welcome sound.

"What has happened? My friend, you are ill! Teil me what I can do for you."

"For me? Oh!" said Stephen, in a choked whisper, "I can do nothing for you! Poor mother—God give you his own strength and comfort!"

She did not can a word of first, but lay after his recovery from the fit of illness and prostration that followed the terrible sheek, appeared in his old haunts wearing an icy mask of calmness, and never mentioning Tom's name. But he looked gray and worn in the face, and the younger generation of men began to say that "Morgan Amory showed his age at last."

at last."
With Gladys it was different; it seemed With Gladys it was different; it seemed as if the tender thoughts of her little boy had softened away the unnatural hardness which those nearest her had noticed after the first year of her married life, and had restored the old, loving sweetness of her girlhood. She was unspeakably patient and tender with her husband, though he shrank noticeably in her presence, seeming to dread nothing whispers, and the poor father's considered scheece-stricken anguish. He spoke as quietly as he could, but his breast heaved with the emotion he struggled to repress, and the rare man's tears welled slowly up from his eyes.

"And you loved my little Tom so much?" said Gladys, pitifully, looking at him with a tearless gaze. "God bless you for it! Now let me go to him." "One moment," he said, gently detaining her. "You will not look at him?" "I will do anything you say," she answered, speaking in a hushed voice that went to his year heart." Is also provided in the possibility of her mentioning their boy. Neither could he bear to come in when she was in her mother's arms, would turn abruptly and leave the room without a word.

"If the man ever had a heart," said the old doctor testily, "it is framed and hung up in the dining-room with his family pedigree! That isn't grief for his child—it is disappointment in the loss of his heir!"

Stephen said nothing, but was seen so often in public with Amory that it excited remark.

When summer came, Mr. Amory briefly declared his intention of going abroad.

"I do not care if I never see the place at Bar Harbor again," he said to his wife, "but you had better take Amy there, Gladys."

Would you rather not have me go with you?" she asked—the tone, indeed, had implied it very plainly. "It would not be best to take Amy with us, of course, but Mrs. Stanhope would come and take care of her for me, and at Bar Harbor she would be so near our doctors that I
